Declarations are admissible to prove the influence of a particular motive upon the mind of the declarant,[38] provided the fact of such influence is relevant,[39] or to prove his purpose.[40] The evidence thus introduced goes only to the question whether such a statement was made, and cannot be considered as evidence of the truth of the statement itself.[41] Mere narrative statements as to the declarant's object in doing a past act are inadmissible.[42] The fact that the statement was made subsequent to the time when the animus or motive of declarant is in question goes to the relevancy of the declaration, and the admission of such evidence is largely discretionary with the trial court.[43] At least where a party has testified as to his motive or purpose, mere hearsay statements of third persons cannot be introduced to explain his motive or purpose.[44]

Of departure or absence. When it is material to show the purpose or reason for the departure of a person, his declarations of his purpose made at or about the time of his departure are admissible.[45] Such statements are admissible as independently relevant statements,[46] although, as hereinafter discussed in § 403, where such statements are made under such circumstances as to constitute a part of the res gestæ they are admissible as such. It is not indispensable that such a declaration be so closely connected with the act of taking the journey as to form a part thereof. It is sufficient if the declaration appears to have been made in a natural manner without circumstances of suspicion and purports to evidence the declarant's state of mind with reference to the purpose of the proposed journey and there be such proximity between the time of the making of the declaration and the incident involved in the suit as, under the circumstances, will furnish reasonable assurance that there has been no change of purpose or design in the meantime.[47]

§ 259. Other Declarations Admissible as Circumstantial Evidence

Various independently relevant declarations other than those before specifically considered have been held to be admissible.

Explanation of conduct. Under some statutes, when information, conversations, letters and replies, and similar evidence are facts to explain motives or conduct, they are admissible as original evidence.[48]

Fact of injury. Where the issue is whether there was an accidental injury to a deceased, the fact that he did mention the injury, or did not mention it, to the one under whom he was working or to his attending physician is competent and material evidence.[49]

Provocation. An unsworn declaration may be admissible as proving or constituting provocation.[50]

Reasons assigned. When the reasons for conduct are relevant, statements indicating the existence of such reasons may be competent.[51] It has been considered that the declarations must accompany the act for which they assign the reason,[52] and that they are evidence of the truth of the reason given,[53] but it has also been held that such a declaration is not evidence of the truth of the facts stated.[54] Complaints not distinctly assigning reasons for conduct are not within the rule.[55]

Recognition. Declarations may be received as circumstantial evidence that the declarant recognized another person.[56]

Fortifying or refreshing memory. An unsworn statement which was calculated to fix the attention[57] or refresh the memory[58] of a person may be admissible for that reason.

3. Statements Constituent of Legal Results

§ 260. In General

An unsworn statement which may, in and of itself, bring about a legal result may be admissible.

An unsworn statement may, in and of itself, bring about, or assist in bringing about, a legal result, in which case proof of the statement is necessarily relevant, because the fact of making the statement is an issue in the case.[59] The statements may be

Response to questions

Under such a statute, where a driver of an automobile, before going on a railroad track at a crossing, asked the occupants of the automobile if the way was clear, the responses by the occupants that they could see nothing were, in an action by the driver against the railroad for running into him at the crossing, admissible in evidence as showing the circumstances under which he acted.—Central of Georgia Ry. Advancement or trust

Declarations of brother purchasing in name of sister, either before or at time of purchase, are admissible to show whether advancement or those of one acting in a representative capacity as an agent[60] or as a public official.[61]

Gifts. The declarations of a donor, either before or after the alleged gift, unless equally consistent with an intent not to give,[62] are admissible, as bearing on his intention, for the purpose of establishing the gift[63] or as corroborative of other testimony.[64] Declarations of the donor are also competent on the question of delivery.[65] The whole of what was said at the time of the transaction must be taken together to ascertain the donor's intention.[66] The length of time between the declaration and the gift affects the weight, but not the competency, of the evidence,[67] unless it is so great as to render the declaration incapable of shedding any light on the question in issue.[68] Prior or contemporaneous declarations of the alleged donor are also admissible to show that a certain transaction was not intended as a gift;[69] but when the gift is once established his subsequent declarations are inadmissible to invalidate it,[70] and such declarations are not rendered admissible by the fact that declarations admitting the gift are in evidence for the donee.[71]

§ 261. Contracts, Agency, Bailment, Sale

Unsworn statements constituting contracts, such as of agency, bailment, and sale, if not falling within statutory prohibitions, are admissible.

Unless the contract is such as to fall within enumerated statutory restrictions, unsworn statements showing a contract[72] or unsworn statements trust was intended, but declarations after purchase are incompetent to control the effect of the prior transaction —Montgomery v. McNutt, 108 So. 752, 214 Ala. 692.

Creation of trust

Declarations as to how property is taken are admissible to show whether such property is taken as a trust.—Forsland v. Gorman, 145 N.E 187, 313 Ill. 252.

Nature of indorsement

Under a statute providing that blank indorsements of negotiable paper may always be explained between the parties themselves, conversation between accommodation indorser and principal was not hearsay, and was pertinent on question whether she was surety for all the apparent principals or cosurety with some of them for the real principal. —Taff v. showing its rescission,[73] are admissible. Such statements may be also admissible because they create the relation of agency,[74] or fix the authority of an agent;[75] because they constitute the incidents of a bailment;[76] or because they assist to constitute a sale of real[77] or personal[78] property, or affect the legal result of a sale.[79] So, also, an offer,[80] and its acceptance[81] or refusal,[82] may be so established by statements of the parties, or their representatives, made while something still remains to be done for the achievement of the legal result in question, and before the parties have separated.[83] It follows that, where the making of a contract extends over several interviews, a relevant statement on any such occasion is competent.[84]

§ 262. Notice, Demand, or Refusal

Notice, demand, or refusal may be shown by evidence of unsworn statements.

Unsworn statements may be admissible as constituting notice,[85] a demand,[86] or a refusal.[87]

§ 263. Denial or Disclaimer

Evidence of unsworn statements, where relevant, may be admissible to show a denial or disclaimer.

A denial may consist of unsworn statements, which are admissible because the fact of denial is in issue,[88] and a disclaimer of ownership, total or partial, may be a relevant fact, properly proved by evidence of the statements of persons not witnesses.[89]

§ 264. Conspiracy, Libel, or Slander

Declarations constituting a criminal agreement or conspiracy, where relevant, are admissible.

Declarations may be admissible because they constitute a criminal agreement or conspiracy.[90] Admissibility of admissions by conspirators and persons acting together see infra § 362.

D. WEIGHT OF TESTIMONY AS TO UNSWORN STATEMENTS

§ 265. In General

Unsworn statements are generally considered as weak evidence, but they are entitled to such weight as they deserve.

It may be stated, as a general rule, that evidence of unsworn statements admitted under the various exceptions to the hearsay rule, see supra §§ 192–264, is regarded as weak evidence, which should be received with caution.[91] Such evidence, when admitted, should be considered and weighed precisely as other evidence,[92] the ultimate determination of

Or.—Goodin v. Cornelius, 200 P. 915, 101 Or. 422.
Tex.—Logan v. Logan, Civ.App., 112 S.W.2d 515, 524, quoting Corpus Juris, error dismissed.
22 C.J. p 290 note 77.

Declarations against interest are the weakest and least satisfactory evidence, and should be received and weighed with caution.—Langston v. Currie, 26 P.2d 160, 95 Mont. 57—Gilcrest v. Bowen, 24 P.2d 141, 95 Mont. 44—Gray v. Grant, 206 P. 410, 62 Mont. 452.

Fabrication

Evidence of oral statements of a person not called as a witness, is open to the objection that it is easily fabricated.—Gray v. Grant, supra—22 C.J. p 290 note 75.

Imperfect comprehension

The statement may have been imperfectly comprehended, wrongly interpreted, or misunderstood by an honest reporting witness and should be received with caution.—Bohen v. North American Life Ins. Co. of Chicago, 177 N.W. 706, 188 Iowa 1349—22 C.J. p 290 note 76.

Imperfect remembrance

(1) It is a common experience of those dealing with human testimony that conversations are very imperfectly remembered.
Iowa.—In re Rich's Estate, 200 N. W. 713, 199 Iowa 902—Bohen v. North American Life Ins. Co. of Chicago, 177 N.W. 706, 188 Iowa 1349.
Kan.—Terbovich v. Kolinda, 58 P.2d 70, 73, 144 Kan. 19, quoting Corpus Juris.
22 C.J. p 289 note 69.

(2) This is particularly true where the exact language used is sought to be recalled after a considerable lapse of time.

22 C.J. p 289 note 70, p 295 note 45.

(3) Likewise, matters are imperfectly remembered where the words spoken were of indifferent interest to the hearer, so that he would have no occasion to treasure them up in his memory.—Crawford v. Hurst, supra—22 C.J. p 290 note 72, p 294 note 16.

(4) Also, where the statement was made in loose, casual, or random conversation, remembrance thereof is often imperfect.

22 C.J. p 290 note 73.

Reputation

Evidence of a common reputation as to the ownership of a right to take water from a spring on public land can have little, if any, probative force, since the nature and extent of a right to divert water depends on a nice application of facts to legal principles with which the average layman has no acquaintance.—Simons v. Inyo Cerro Gordo Mining & Power Co., 192 P. 144, 48 Cal. App. 524.

Statutes

The distrust of this character of evidence has even found expression in statutes providing that testimony as to oral admission should be "scanned with care," or requiring the court to instruct the jury that such testimony should be regarded "with caution."
Cal.—People v. Sternberg, 43 P. 201, 111 Cal. 11.

Conclusion as to what declarant said, without stating what declarant actually said, is not entitled to weight.—Sproat v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 137 A. 621, 289 Pa. 351.

Ambiguous and equivocal statements are without value as testimony.—Keystone Mill Co. v. Peach River Lumber Co., Tex.Civ.App., 96 S.W. 64.

Hearsay evidence, admitted without objection, is held of little weight.—In re Guilford's Will, 185 N.Y.S. 248.

Pedigree

(1) Declarations relative to pedigree are not entitled to the same weight that is to be given to direct and positive evidence.—Lauderdale v. O'Neill, 177 P. 113, 74 Okl. 119.

(2) The circumstances and conditions surrounding entry in family Bible as hearsay declaration of pedigree are of paramount importance in determining weight thereof.—Prudential Ins. Co. of America v. Pierce's Adm'x, 109 S.W.2d 616, 270 Ky. 216.

(3) The reliance to be placed on a declaration as to pedigree depends on the circumstances attending the declaration, as well as the knowledge which declarant is supposed to have possessed as to the matters of which he spoke.—Denoyer v. Ryan, C.C. Minn., 24 F. 77.

(4) Evidence of pedigree must be considered in weighing evidence.—In re Noel's Heirship, 10 P.2d 259, 156 Okl. 177.

(5) Pedigree evidence may constitute substantial evidence which will support a verdict.—In re Braig's Estate, Cal.App., 110 P.2d 1066.

(6) Particular pedigree testimony held prima facie trustworthy.—Prickett v. Frum, 132 S.E. 501, 101 W.Va. 217.

(7) Particular pedigree testimony held insufficient to establish issue.—Smith v. Lynn, Tex.Civ.App., 152 S.W.2d 338.

the weight to be given them resting in the province of the trier of the facts.[93] Under some circumstances, such statements may be sufficient to prove the issue in question[94] and to support a decision,[95] particularly where supported by other evidence.[96] Where the issue is one of intention,[97] or the character of declarant's possession of property,[98] his declarations at or about the time are of much probative force, and under some circumstances, a declaration, honestly made, is entitled to great weight.[99] Such unsworn statements are not, as a rule, conclusive,[1] and they are not control-

Public reputation and declarations of early settlers may be insufficient to establish that a monument marking a section corner is the southeast corner, rather than the southwest corner, of a particular section—Hickman v. Jones, 230 N.W. 95, 119 Neb. 485.

Argument

In suit for injunction restraining enforcement of Virginia statutes regulating writing of insurance on ground that statutes were unconstitutional, resolution of Virginia Association of Insurance Agents construing statutes and interpretation of statute by chief examiner of Virginia insurance bureau which were promulgated after institution of suit were not entitled to weight in determining controversy except in so far as they constituted arguments on part of defendants as to interpretation of statute and its probable effect.—Osborne v. Ozlin, D.C.Va., 29 F.Supp. 71, affirmed Osborn v. Ozlin, 60 S.Ct. 758, 310 U.S. 53, 84 L.Ed. 1074.

Conclusive

"What may be the state of mind of a capable person at a given time is a matter of fact of which that person alone has knowledge. No other person is in a position to know absolutely or accurately to declare the truth. His act may belie his declaration, or antecedent declaration may tender refutation of latest expression, and, thus, issue of fact may be made against him. But wherever he presently makes declaration of what his intent was at a given time and that declaration is against his present claim of interest he ought to be concluded thereby—barring, of course, reason to doubt his competency or presence of other excusing conditions."—Stephenson v. Barrow, Tex.Com App., 15 S.W.2d 575, 576, reversing Stevenson v. Barrow, Civ. App., 5 S.W.2d 200.

Remote declarations of intention to do some act in the future are of little weight.—Kessler v. Von Bank, 174 N.W. 839, 144 Minn. 220.

Self-serving declarations are insufficient to establish intention.—Commonwealth v. Clark County Nat. Bank, 219 S.W. 175, 187 Ky. 151, error dismissed Clark County Nat. Bank v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 41 S.Ct. 147.

Parties to contract

Acts or declarations of parties to a contract, especially when they are contrary to interest or repugnant to interest, done with a full and contemporaneous appreciation of the circumstances, are of peculiar force.—Eppes v. Eppes, 195 S.E. 694, 169 Va. 778.

ling if the actual facts and circumstances justify a contrary conclusion.[2] A court or jury are not bound to give equal credit to all parts of a statement; they may believe a part and disregard the rest.[3] Statements made ante litem motam are entitled to greater weight than statements made after the controversy has arisen.[4]

A person's memory of his own utterances is regarded as more authentic than that of a listener.[5]

Construction. All statements should be construed with reference to the subject matter of the conversation.[6] Of course, a declaration should not be construed so as to have a meaning different from that obviously intended.[7]

Gifts. Mere declarations of intent to give, or that a gift has been made, are generally held to be insufficient to establish a gift,[8] especially where the donor's acts are inconsistent with his having parted with possession and control of the property;[9] nor are they sufficient to disprove a gift otherwise shown to have been made.[10] Of course, declarations of the donor as to the making of a gift are to be weighed by the jury, or by the court in trials without a jury, and when considered together with other corroborative evidence may be sufficient to establish a gift.[11] Mere declarations of a donor that he has made a gift are not sufficient evidence of a delivery,[12] and until a declaration may be seen to include a statement of delivery as a matter of fact, or facts from which a delivery may reasonably be inferred, it is not evidence of a delivery.[13] It is generally held, however, where it does not appear that the declarations were made in jest,[14] that delivery may be proved by the declarations of the donor.[15] A declaration by an alleged donor of an intention to give and the subsequent possession of the property by the donee may be sufficient to establish a gift.[16] Even where the gift remained in the hands of the donor until his death, it may be proved by acknowledgments of the donor if the jury are satisfied that it was attended with all the necessary formalities.[17] Where the proof of an alleged gift rests on the declarations of the donor, those declarations must be unequivocal,[18] especially where the surroundings favor the wrongful acquisition of the property.[19]

A donee's declarations and acts are not in themselves sufficient to show a gift.[20]

§ 266. Statements of Decedents

Testimony as to the oral statements of deceased persons is the weakest kind of evidence.

Exposed to all the infirmities mentioned in the preceding section and to the further objection that it is impossible, in most cases, to convict the witness of perjury if his testimony is willfully false, testimony as to the oral statements of deceased persons is therefore regarded as the weakest kind of evidence and subjected to the closest scrutiny.[21] Testimony coming from one's own written declarations is entitled to more serious consideration than is evidence of a secondary or hearsay character as to what a person, since deceased, said in life.[22] Where one party has introduced an alleged statement by deceased, made after the injury causing death, it is competent for the other party to show that deceased never recovered consciousness after the injury.[23]

§ 267. Positive and Negative Testimony

Positive testimony of a witness that he heard a statement made usually outweighs the testimony of other persons who were present and who testify merely to a want of recollection,[24] or that they did not hear it,[25] especially if the circumstances of the particular case indicate that they were inattentive.[26] Such positive testimony may outweigh the alleged declarant's testimony that he has no recollection of making the statement attributed to him,[27] or even his express denial, where he concedes that he cannot definitely recollect what he said,[28] or where such denial, under the circumstances of the case, is in effect merely an assertion of absence of recollection.[29] Positive testimony has no clear advantage over a flat denial by the alleged declar-ant[30] who gives his version of what he said,[31] or over a positive denial by other witnesses who had equal means of knowledge and were paying attention.[32] Indeed the circumstances may be such that the alleged declarant's statement of want of recollection will outweigh the positive testimony of the reporting witness.[33] Negative testimony of persons in daily contact with deceased that they never heard him make any such statement as claimed is, of course, entitled to weight;[34] but affirmative evidence of a conversation with deceased person is, as a rule, entitled to more weight than mere negative testimony of others, not present at that time, that they never heard deceased say anything like that.[35]

§ 268. Circumstances Tending to Disparage Testimony

Various circumstances may disparage testimony of unsworn statements.

The following circumstances have been noticed as tending to impair the credibility of testimony to oral declarations: That the testimony is improbable;[36] that the alleged statement is inconsistent with proved facts in the case,[37] absurd,[38] or demonstrably false;[39] that the statement is not in harmony with the conduct of the witness or of declarant,[40] or that it conflicts with declarant's statements to other persons at other times;[41] that the witness was not on such terms of intimacy with declarant that the latter would have been likely to make the witness a confidant;[42] that the witness is not corroborated by any independent circumstances in the case;[43] that the alleged declarant testifies in direct contradiction of the witness,[44] especially where the former is disinterested and the latter biased;[45] that the testimony of the witness is contradicted by other persons present at the time,[46] or that the latter did not hear the alleged statement;[47] that witnesses testifying to the statement do not agree in their memory of the essential part thereof;[48] that a witness testifying to a statement made in conversation cannot give the entire conversation,[49] or was not present so as to hear all of it;[50] that the alleged statement was made in a hurried conversation,[51] or in the heat of discussion;[52] that the witness was deaf[53] or very young[54] when the alleged statement was made, or is grossly ignorant,[55] or has slight appreciation of the force of words and little skill in expressing in his own language what others have said;[56] that better evi-

ment verbatim may[87] or may not[88] decrease the weight of his testimony according to the probability, in view of the circumstances of the statement and the time which has elapsed since it was made, that the witness would have been impressed by the statement and would still retain in his memory the exact language used. Indeed the circumstances may be such that the mere profession of the witness that he can give a verbatim report will, of itself, cast suspicion on his testimony.[89] Where a witness cannot recollect what was said, but declares that he can recollect what was not said, the latter statement is of questionable credibility.[90] Declarations against interest have been said to have but slight weight as against documentary evidence.[91]

§ 269. Circumstances Favorable to Testimony

Various circumstances have been noticed as tending to accredit testimony as to unsworn statements.

The following facts have been noticed as tending to accredit testimony to oral statements: That the testimony of the witness is reasonable and probable in view of the established facts,[92] or is corroborated by the other evidence in the case;[93] that the subject matter of the statement was likely to be discussed between the witness and declarant, who were intimate acquaintances;[94] that several witnesses concur in their testimony as to the statement,[95] while declarant himself, highly interested, alone denies it;[96] that the temptation to falsify was great, and the witness could have sworn to more specific and numerous declarations without fear of contradiction;[97] that several witnesses testify as to the same statement having been made to them at different times;[98] that the conduct of the witness subsequent to the alleged statement seems to have been influenced by it;[99] that the subsequent conduct of the alleged declarant tends to confirm the testimony;[1] that the witness, with no possible motive to prevaricate, related the same story soon after the alleged statement was made;[2] that the several witnesses who testify to the alleged statement had met declarant for the express purpose of discussing the subject matter of the statement;[3] that the attention of the witness was specially directed to the statement;[4] that the circumstances were such that the persons testifying must have given close attention to the statements when made, and to the exact meaning of the person who made them;[5] that the memory of the witness is refreshed by a memorandum made at the time;[6] that the witness is a person of unimpeachable character;[7] that the witnesses are disinterested and unbiased,[8] and are not impeached in any manner;[9] that the witness testifies very circumstantially and positively;[10] that no attempt is made to contradict the witness where it might have been done with effect had his testimony been untrue;[11] that the alleged declarant, a party to the suit, although present at the trial, is not called as a witness,[12] or, testifying in the case, does not contradict the witness or offer any explanations.[13] Where the alleged declarant denies the statement, circumstances favorable to the testimony of the reporting witness may be found in such circumstances as that the denial is not delivered in a satisfactory manner,[14] or is not so clear and positive as the opposing testimony;[15] that the alleged declarant has evidently testified falsely in other particulars; or that he gives an unsatisfactory explanation of his language and attributes to it a sense improbable in itself and contrary to that in which it was understood by the witness.[16]

VIII. ADMISSIONS

A. IN GENERAL

§ 270. Definitions and Distinctions

"Admissions" in the law of evidence are concessions or voluntary acknowledgments made by a party of the existence of certain facts. They may be classified as being either judicial or extrajudicial; but some authorities have divided admissions into quasi admissions on the one hand, and true or judicial admissions on the other.

"Admissions," in the law of evidence, have been defined as being concessions or voluntary acknowledgments made by a party of the existence of certain facts.[17] They have also been defined as statements by a party or someone identified with him in legal interest of the existence of a fact which is relevant to the cause of his adversary.[18] The term embraces any statement of fact made by a party which is against his interest[19] or unfavorable to the conclusion for which he contends[20] or inconsistent with the facts alleged by him.[21] Admissions may be either direct or express,[22] or implied or indirect.[23]

Extrajudicial and judicial admissions; quasi admissions. For the purposes of their treatment in this title, admissions are divided into two main categories: (1) Judicial admissions, which are admissions appearing of record in the proceedings of a court,[24] and which are considered infra §§ 299–313. (2) Admissions not so appearing, which are designated extrajudicial admissions and are considered infra §§ 272–298. It should be noted, however, that some authorities, having in view the effect of admissions rather than the circumstances under which they are made, have divided admissions into "quasi admissions" on the one hand, and admissions proper or "true" or "judicial" admissions on the other. Under this classification quasi admissions are acts or utterances, usually extrajudicial, which create an inconsistency with, and discredit to a greater or lesser degree, the present claim or other evidence of the person creating the inconsistency[25] and constitute but items in the mass of evidence,[26] while admissions proper[27] or true admissions[28] or judicial admissions[29] are formal acts done in the course of judicial proceedings which waive or dispense with the production of evidence, by conceding for the purposes of litigation that the proposition of fact involved is true.

"Admissions" are distinguished from "confessions" in that the latter term is used only in criminal cases and properly applies only to acknowledgments of guilt.[30]

The distinctions between declarations against interest and admissions are discussed supra § 217 b.

§ 271. To Whom Made

Although there is some authority to the contrary, it is generally held that it is immaterial to whom an admission is made. It need not be communicated to the opposite party.

A statement need not be communicated to the opposite party in order to be competent as an admission.[31] It is admissible if made to the agent[32] or attorney[33] of the party offering it, or to declarant's employee,[34] or to anyone sufficiently connected with the transaction.[35] Indeed it has been stated and held that as respects its admissibility it is immaterial to whom an admission was made, so long as all the other requisites are present.[36] This is borne out by the fact that in the great number of cases referred to elsewhere in this discussion, where admissions made to persons bearing varied or no relationship to the declarant have been held admissible, the question of such relationship or absence thereof has not been raised. However, it has been held that an admission to a stranger to the transaction, who did not appear to represent the adverse party, is not admissible.[37]

mission is not objectionable as hearsay; indeed the rule under which such evidence is admitted is a well recognized exception to the hearsay rule,[40] and proof of an admission by hearsay evidence does not depend for its admissibility on its conforming to any other exception to the hearsay rule, such as res gestæ.[41] The admissibility of extrajudicial admissions rests on the fact of inconsistency with the present position of the party who made them.[42] Where a statement is admissible as tending to prove a particular fact, the fact that it also tends to prove other facts does not preclude its admission.[43]

Purpose and intent of statement. Although, as appears infra § 298, the time, place, and circumstances of the making of an extrajudicial admission do not as a rule affect its admissibility, nevertheless the purpose and intent with which a statement is made are sometimes considered in determining whether or not it is an admission so as to be receivable in evidence as such.[44] Thus it will be seen in § 285 infra that a statement made for the purpose of effecting a compromise is generally regarded as not being an admission and is inadmissible. So too statements made in tax returns and assessment lists are by some authorities held not admissible as admissions, see infra § 283. Circumstances as affecting the voluntary character of an admission are considered infra § 278.

Admission based on hearsay. Although it has been held that statements made as mere matters of hearsay are not receivable in evidence as admissions,[45] there is also authority for the view that,

Statements held admissible

(1) In an action for damages for wrongful killing, evidence of a declaration by defendant, susceptible of the inference, when considered with other evidence, that he was the perpetrator of the homicide, was competent.—Kuykendall v. Edmondson, 94 So. 546, 208 Ala. 553.

(2) In an action for injuries to a minor struck by an automobile, evidence that defendant had stated he "had sent a man out there and he had run over a little boy" was held admissible to show that the driver was in defendant's service at the time of the injury.—Bains Motor Co. v. Lecroy, 96 So 483, 209 Ala. 345.

(3) In an action for injuries to a boy where plaintiff's evidence showed that he was under fourteen, it was error to exclude defendant's offered testimony that, when he applied for employment, the boy stated he was over sixteen, as evidence of his age.—Terry Dairy Co. v. Nalley, 225 S.W. 887, 146 Ark. 448, 12 A.L.R. 1208.

(4) In suit against physician for burn from electro-therapeutic machine, defendant's statement to plaintiff's mother, in response to her statement that plate was loose and burn due to carelessness, "I know it and I can't tell you how bad I feel about it," was admissible as admission against interest.—Adamsen v. Magnelia, 280 Ill.App. 418.

44. Statement prepared for party offering it

In an action for negligence in adjustment of claim against an insurance company, a memorandum prepared by an accountant in connection with preparation of proof of loss, manifestly prepared either by or with coöperation of defendant in plaintiffs' interest as plaintiffs' agent, as one of the steps in defendant's work in securing adjustment, was not admissible in evidence as an admission by defendant, direct or implied, of its correctness, and, not being supported by any proof of either its authenticity or correctness on the part of plaintiffs, was not competent from that point of view.—Alper v. Bookstaver, 190 N.Y.S. 515.

Statements in an obituary notice concerning the mental faculties of the deceased are not admissible against the persons who had the notice published, since "such a notice does not purport to be, and is not understood as, a statement of facts from which any one is justified in drawing legal conclusions."—In re Hull, 89 N.W. 979, 983, 117 Iowa 738.

even though the statement was not based on the personal knowledge of the one by whom it was made, it may nevertheless constitute an admission and be admitted as such, if the circumstances indicate an adoption of the hearsay matter by the declarant.[46]

Withdrawal of admission. While an extrajudicial admission may be withdrawn before it is acted on, it is still evidence of the fact admitted, and its withdrawal goes only to its weight.[47]

b. Requirement That Statement Be One of Fact

To be competent as an admission a statement must be one of fact, and a statement which is a mere opinion or conclusion or a conclusion of law is as a rule inadmissible. An admission by a party of his fault or of his adversary's freedom from fault is generally held admissible.

Reason for rule

"The admissibility of this class of evidence does not depend upon the personal knowledge of a defendant, but is predicated upon the assumption that he will not make statements of fact contrary to his interest unless he is satisfied that such statements are true."—Janus v. A prediction is inadmissible as an admission of the truth of the thing predicted.—Atlanta & Lowry Nat. Bank v. Maughon, 131 S.E. 916, 35 Ga.App. 25.

Based on hearsay

In will contest wherein testator's son testified that after he told his wife, who was proponent of will, of suffering which mother and children had endured at hands of testator, wife's reply was, "He must be crazy; I wouldn't live with a man like that," exclusion of question to son as to how many times his wife had said that in her opinion testator must be crazy was held not error, since wife's statement that testator must be crazy was mere opinion based on alleged facts outside of wife's own knowledge.—Rynn v. Rynn, 181 A. 289, 55 R.I. 310.

Honesty of an individual

Defendant's letter stating his opinion that plaintiff was a person completely honorable and able to perform any contract he might make, etc., not being an admission of a matter of fact, was held inadmissible.—Negociacion Agricola y Ganadera de San Enrique, S. A., v. Love, Tex.Civ.App., 220 S.W. 224.

in issue is generally held inadmissible as an admission of the fact, although it may be admissible where the fact that a party had a certain opinion at a particular time is of itself relevant.[52]

Legal conclusions. As a general rule, statements or admissions relating to a question of law[53] or constituting conclusions of law[54] or opinions as to what the law is,[55] are not admissible in evidence, for the reason that a party should not be affected by statements which may be attributed to a misapprehension of his legal right.[56] This rule has been held to apply where the matter admitted involves both a question of law and a question of fact,[57] but there is also authority for the view that an admission in which law and fact are inextricably mingled may be shown.[58] Where the admission is actually one of fact it should not be excluded because made in the form of a conclusion of law.[59] The general rule governing the admissibility of statements involving opinions or conclusions of law has been said to be that they are no more admissible than they would be if offered by a witness on the stand,[60] but it has also been held that an admission involving an opinion or conclusion of law or of mixed law and fact need not, in order to be admissible, conform to that standard.[61]

Admission of fault or freedom from fault. A number of cases have held that a statement made by a party to an action involving negligence that he or someone other than his adversary was at fault or that his adversary was free from fault comes within the general rule excluding opinions or conclusions and is inadmissible,[62] at least where the statement was based on facts not within the personal knowledge of declarant.[63] However, such statements are generally held admissible[64] as against the contention that they should be excluded as opinions

Opinion accompanied by fact on which based

(1) Defendant's statement that he was driving while under the influence of liquor, and it was his fault that the accident had occurred, was admissible.—Liebster v. Lucas, 82 Pa. Super. 184.

(2) In guest's action against host for injuries sustained in automobile accident, exclusion of evidence of statements made by host immediately and for several days after accident to effect that accident was all her fault because she was driving too fast held reversible error.—McDaniel v. or conclusions,[65] and regardless of the fact that the statements were not based on the personal knowledge of the declarants.[66]

Valuation of property. As a general rule, the valuation placed on property by a party may be shown against him as an admission.[67]

§ 273. Purpose for Which Admitted

Admissions are ordinarily admissible as original or substantive evidence of the truth of the statements made or of the existence of facts which they tend to establish; while they may be used to impeach or contradict the testimony of the party who made them, their admissibility does not depend on, nor should their effect be confined to, their tendency to do so.

Admissions are ordinarily admissible as original or substantive evidence of the truth of the statements made or of the existence of any facts which they have a tendency to establish,[68] and their admissibility is not dependent on any tendency to discredit the person by whom they were made.[69] Of course, where the party who has made the ad-

Erroneous view of the law
The fact that declarant's view of the law is erroneous does not render the admission of liability inadmissible, where, if the accident occurred in the manner testified to by him, there was little occasion for his saying that he was to blame.—Robbins v. Weed, 169 N.W. 773, 187 Iowa 64.

missions testifies, and the admissions are contradictory to or inconsistent with his testimony, the admissions are competent for the purpose of discrediting and impeaching him,[70] although they should not be limited to the purpose of discrediting.[71]

§ 274. Actions or Proceedings in Which Admitted

Admissions are equally competent whether offered in real or personal actions or in probate proceedings.

The nature of the action or proceeding does not affect the admissibility of admissions. Thus they are equally competent whether offered in real[72] or personal[73] actions or in probate proceedings,[74] or, as appears in Divorce § 125, in divorce proceedings.

§ 275. By Which Party Provable

An admission may be proved only at the instance of a party whose interests are adverse to those of the declarant.

An admission may be proved only at the instance of a party whose interests are adverse to those of the declarant; it cannot be proved by the declarant himself or by one in privity with him.[75] The fact that the declaration of the party offering it was communicated to the adverse party does not make it admissible as an admission by the adverse party,[76] although, as appears infra §§ 294–297, it may be admitted in connection with evidence showing an admission by silence or acquiescence on the part of the party to whom such declaration was communicated.

§ 276. Relevancy and Materiality

To be admissible, an admission must, at the time it is offered, be relevant to, and have a material bearing on, the issues in the case.

Statements held irrelevant
(1) In a prosecution for false imprisonment growing out of arrest of plaintiff as a deserter, evidence as to statements by plaintiff showing his intention to enter into the military service is inadmissible, the question being whether plaintiff had actually become a soldier when defendants assumed to exercise military authority over him.—Tyler v. Pomeroy, 8 Allen, Mass., 480.
(2) Correspondence between plaintiff and defendant in which plaintiff refused to allow defendant's physicians to make a physical examination should have been excluded, where the uncontroverted evidence showed that later he agreed to an examination and that one was made.—Galveston, H. & S. ment itself possesses these characteristics it is not necessary that the transaction in connection with which it was made should be relevant and material.[80]

An admission indicating bad faith in connection with prosecution or defense of an action should be received.[81]

§ 277. Certainty

An admission should possess the same degree of certainty as would be required in the evidence which it represents. The statement need not be a direct, but may be an indirect, admission.

An admission should possess the same degree of certainty as would be required in the evidence which it represents,[82] and hence mere conjectures[83] or suggestions as to what might have happened if certain circumstances had not occurred[84] are not competent; neither should an alleged admission be considered where the subject matter to which it refers is left uncertain.[85] It is not necessary that the statement should be a direct admission; it may be an indirect admission, as where it bears on the issue incidentally or circumstantially.[86] A statement is not competent as an admission where it does not, under a reasonable construction, appear to admit or acknowledge the fact which is sought to be proved by it.[87]

Statements held not admissions
(1) Insurance carrier's check to hospital, with notation thereon that it was for X-ray examination of one injured at insured's plant, was not admissible as admission by insured that employee suffered injury as alleged.—McMahon v. Edward G. Budd

§ 278. Voluntary Character

An admission is not competent unless it was made voluntarily.

An admission is not of sufficient probative weight to be competent unless it is voluntary;[88] and hence a statement obtained or made under duress,[89] particularly when coupled with fraud,[90] is not competent as an admission; but an admission does not lose its voluntary character because it was made before an arbitrator,[91] a magistrate taking a deposition,[92] or an immigration officer,[93] and an admission, otherwise voluntary, is not incompetent because made in the grand jury room, in the presence of the jurors, where declarant was not sent for as a witness, and the jury were not in session.[94] It has also been held that an admission does not lose its voluntary character because made while the declarant was in the custody of an officer of the law.[95] The fact that an admission is made in response to a false suggestion of fact does not render it inadmissible.[96]

Mistake, ignorance of language, etc. A statement made by reason of a mistake is admissible,[97] as is a statement made by one hysterical but not unconscious.[98] It has been held that a statement is admissible despite the claim of the party who signed it that he was unable to read or understand it,[99] but it has also been held that a statement in a paper signed by mark by one who could neither read nor write could not constitute an admission.[1]

(5) A statement that one will not appeal is not an admission of liability.—Lee v. Moore, 161 Ill.App. 643.

(6) A subsequent deed, executed by the successor of a grantor of a vein of coal in the land described, from which was excepted the coal claimed by the grantee's successor, was not an admission of adverse ownership.—Laidley v. Rowe, 119 A. 474, 275 Pa. 389.

(7) In a dentist's action against a father for services to his minor son, the father's answer to a bill made out against the son, but sent to him, the father, that it would not be paid "for quite some time yet," was neither an admission of liability on his part nor evidence of ratification of the son's act in contracting for the services.—Stimpson v. Hunter, 125 N. E. 155, 234 Mass. 61, 7 A.L.R. 1067.

Applicability of "Sweating Act"

Since the "Sweating Act" renders inadmissible only such statements as are obtained from a person in custody charged with a crime and questioned in an attempt to obtain information concerning his connection with or knowledge thereof, statements made to officers were not inadmissible where the parties had not been arrested and were not in custody charged with a crime, and the officers had merely been sent to notify them that the county attorney wanted to see them.—Marsee v. Admission of signature but denial of statement see infra § 282.

§ 279. Oral Admissions

Oral admissions are competent evidence as to such facts as are provable by parol evidence; and this is true even where there is an admission in writing to the same effect.

Apart from the many cases involving oral admissions which have been referred to in other connections in this discussion of extrajudicial admissions, it has been frequently held that oral admissions of a party are competent evidence against him,[2] as to such facts,[3] and such facts only,[4] as are provable by parol evidence. This is true even though there is an admission in writing to the same effect,[5] such as a promissory note;[6] and it is likewise true although a writing might be required to achieve the same result in the absence of such an admission.[7] So, also, the existence of any facts which are legally competent at law or in equity to affect the operation of a written instrument may be established by oral admissions.[8]

§ 280. Through Interpreter

If the parties have voluntarily agreed to such method of conversation, an admission made through an interpreter is admissible; and it is generally held that such an admission may be proved by evidence other than that of the interpreter.

A competent oral admission may be made through an interpreter,[9] where such method of conversation is, in some manner, voluntarily adopted by the parties.[10] It is generally held that such admissions may be proved otherwise than by the evidence of an interpreter;[11] but there is some authority to the contrary,[12] and it has also been held that an admission made through an interpreter is not admissible unless the interpreter is produced as a witness to testify that he translated truly.[13]

§ 281. Over Telephone

If the speaker is sufficiently identified, an admission made over the telephone is competent evidence.

An admission made in a telephone conversation may be proved,[14] where the witness identified the speaker[15] by his voice[16] or otherwise,[17] and there is no doubt as to the identity of the person who made the admission.[18] Where a person's telephone number is called and there is a response and reply from one who assumes to be or to represent the person called, admissions made by the person answering are received without proof of the identity of the speaker.[19] On the other hand, it has been held that the mere statement of the person responding to a telephone call that he is the manager of the corporation called is insufficient proof of such fact so as to render his admissions over the telephone admissible against the corporation.[20]

Use of intermediary. A telephone conversation is competent notwithstanding the fact that it was necessary to use the services of an intermediary,[21] and such intermediary has forgotten what was said.[22]

§ 282. Written Admissions

An admission may be contained in a writing made by a party or his authorized agent, or adopted by him by some unequivocal act.

An admission may be contained in a writing,[23] including writings of the character which are customarily employed in mercantile affairs,[24] made by a party, or by his authorized agent, or adopted by him[25] by some unequivocal act, such as revising them,[26] or admitting their correctness when they are shown or read over to him.[27]

Admission of signature but denial of statement. In an action for personal injuries a written statement signed by plaintiff and claimed to have been made by him prior to the action, giving the circumstances of his injury, is admissible although plaintiff, while admitting his signature, denies having said the things contained therein.[28]

No estoppel
Where a statement admittedly signed by plaintiff, is competent and relevant, the doctrine of estoppel cannot be invoked to prevent its introduction, even though there is evidence to the effect that plaintiff did not state some of the things contained therein.—Watkins v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 250 S.W. 350, 158 Ark. 386.

§ 283. Particular Documents or Writings

Competent admissions may be made in sealed instruments, promissory notes, letters, telegrams, memoranda, and an almost endless variety of miscellaneous writings. The authorities are not in harmony on the question of the competency of tax returns and assessments as evidence of admissions.

A competent admission may be made in a sealed instrument, such as a bond,[29] a deed,[30] a mortgage,[31] a lease,[32] a release,[33] or an assignment of a judgment.[34]

Promissory notes. A promissory note or an indorsement thereon may embody an admission[35] of the amount lent[36] or paid[37] thereon.

Memoranda. Provided they are sufficiently definite, memoranda may constitute admissions and be received as prima facie evidence,[38] and this is true even though they be of an informal character,[39] and are not signed.[40] Memoranda are competent as admissions regardless of whom they are given to,[41] and, indeed, even though they are intended only for private inspection.[42] Of course, a memorandum which does not have the probative force to show an admission, is inadmissible as such.[43]

Letters. Letters written by a party or by his authorized agent may constitute written admissions,[44]

and to render them admissible in evidence it is not necessary that they shall have been sent to the party offering them,[45] or that the letters to which they are replies shall be produced or accounted for.[46]

In accordance with the general rules governing admissions considered supra §§ 272–278, letters are not admissible as admissions where they are irrelevant[47] or have no probative force as respects the fact in issue,[48] or where the alleged admissions contained therein are not sufficiently definite or certain,[49] or where the letters do not themselves show an admission of some fact.[50]

Telegrams. A telegram may be given in evidence as an admission provided it is shown that it actually emanated from the party against whom it is sought to be used,[51] or that the statements therein are fairly attributable to him.[52] The fact that the telegram was sent to one other than the party offering it does not render it inadmissible.[53]

Tax returns and assessments. Except where they are clothed with a statutory privilege against disclosure,[54] returns for taxation, being statements of the party to be affected under circumstances in which it is incumbent on him to disclose the truth, are regarded by the great weight of authority as admissions which may be received in evidence,[55]

Income tax
In action against corporation to recover balance due to plaintiff's intestate for services rendered by in-even on the question of value.[56] However, some authorities hold that, since it is a known and common practice for property owners to minimize the value of the property listed by them in such returns, such returns are not to be considered or admitted as admissions against interest on the question of value,[57] although they may be admissible otherwise than as admissions.[58] On the other hand, tax lists or assessments which are not prepared by the person to be affected, and do not even represent, in all cases, the judgment of the person by whom they are prepared, as to the full value of property listed, are generally held not competent as admissions on a question as to value,[59] although some cases have held such assessments admissible where they were apparently based on the owner's valuation.[60]

The rule that in order to be received into evidence an admission must have been made by the party against whom it is offered, or by some one for whose admissions he is responsible, has been applied to tax returns or assessments.[61] Thus an assessment list or schedule not signed by the party against whom it is offered or by his agent,[62] nor, indeed, sworn to by any person,[63] is inadmissible. So, too, it has been held that tax returns of a corporation are not ordinarily competent as evidence of admissions by individual stockholders.[64] Tax assessments made by a state agency and not by a city are not competent as admissions by the city as to the character of property.[65]

Miscellaneous. The principle that written ad-testate to corporation, copies of corporation's income tax statements were admissible as admissions of facts therein stated.—Wentz v. Guaranteed Sand & Gravel Co., 287 N.W. 113, 205 Minn. 611.

Omissions from returns

Tax returns purporting to list all of the taxpayer's property of a particular class which do not include the property in question are admissible as admissions against interest.

Reasons for rule

"The valuation . . . was for a wholly different purpose from the present one. This court knows judicially and as a part of the financial history of the state that land is never assessed for purposes of taxation at its real cash market value, though that may be the law, but only in comparison with other lands around it, and, if petitioner valued it, we would presume she placed such comparative value, instead of the real market value, upon it."—Wray v. son of being not signed,[9] executed,[10] or delivered.[11] Accordingly, contracts have been held competent evidence of admissions, although they were unenforceable,[12] as by reason of the operation of the statute of frauds,[13] or because one of the parties was a foreign corporation not qualified to do business within the state.[14] However, it has been held that, where a contract signed by plaintiff has been excluded because of plaintiff's inability to prove its execution by defendant, defendant is not entitled to introduce the contract as a statement of plaintiff without consenting to be bound thereby.[15]

§ 285. Offers of Compromise

a. In general
b. What constitutes offer or part of negotiations

a. In General

Proof of an offer by either party to compromise the controversy involved in a litigation between them, or of any statements or admissions made as part of compromise negotiations, is generally inadmissible.

It is a well established principle that proof of an offer to compromise the controversy involved in a litigation, or of the fact that an offer to compromise was made, is inadmissible,[16] apart, at least, from its possible admissibility as independently relevant evidence, see infra § 286. The rule extends beyond proof of the bare fact of the offer and the terms thereof, and excludes as well proof of anything that occurred during the negotiations and constituted an inseparable part of the effort to compromise, including statements and admissions made for that purpose and with that end in view.[17]

Elicited by cross-examination

Evidence of compromise, adduced directly by plaintiff, was held incompetent, although brought out by proper questions on cross-examination.—Yoakam v. Hogan, 243 P. 21, 198 Cal. 16.

Unexecuted release having no consideration

That defendant voluntarily repaired plaintiff's automobile after a collision so that the release of liability tendered by defendant, if signed by plaintiff, would have been ineffective for want of consideration, does not make the release, which was a mere offer to buy peace, admissible on plaintiff's behalf as an admission by defendant.—Moore v. The fact that a party admits that he made an offer of compromise does not render such offer admissible in evidence,[18] but it has been held that, where a party has admitted to a third person that he offered his adversary a certain amount as damages for the injuries suffered by the latter, this may be shown on the question of damages.[19] Mere willingness to consider an offer of compromise is, of course, inadmissible,[20] and it has also been held proper to exclude evidence that an agent was authorized to offer a compromise.[21]

Reasons for rule. One of the reasons often assigned for the rule is that, since the law favors the settlement of controversies out of court,[22] a person is entitled to endeavor to "buy his peace" without danger of being prejudiced in case his effort should fail;[23] hence any communications made toward that end will be regarded as privileged.[24] Another reason advanced is that a true offer of compromise

does not, in legal contemplation, involve an admission on the part of a defendant that he is legally liable, or on the part of a plaintiff that his claim is groundless or even doubtful, since it is made with a view to avoiding controversy and saving the expense of litigation,[25] and since, as appears infra § 285 b, it is the very distinguishing mark of an offer of compromise that it is made tentatively, hypothetically, and in contemplation of mutual concessions;[26] and, if the evidence should be received, it would have a tendency to mislead the jury, who might well take the offer to indicate what in law it does not indicate.[27]

By and to whom made and purposes for which inadmissible. Although, as appears infra § 286, some authorities hold such evidence admissible where the fact of the offer is independently relevant, a number of authorities have stated in broad terms that evidence coming within the rule is inadmissible as an admission against the interest of the person who made the offer or statement.[28] The rule excluding such evidence is applied with equal force whether the offer was made by the party against whom a claim is asserted or by the party who asserts a claim;[29] thus the offer cannot be shown as an admission of liability,[30] nor the amount

The rule excluding an offer of compromise is based on the proposition that such an offer does not ordinarily proceed from and imply a belief that the adversary's claim is well founded, but rather that the further prosecution of the claim, whether well-founded or not, will cause such annoyance as is preferably avoided by the payment of the sum offered and the offer therefore does not signify the admission at all.

offered as an admission of the amount of liability[31] or of any liability whatever[32] by the party against whom the claim is made, nor, on the other hand, can the offer be shown as an admission by the party making the claim that he is not entitled to more than he has offered to accept.[33]

Although there is authority to the contrary,[34] it has been held that the rule of exclusion applies only between the parties.[35] So a statement to a third person cannot be excluded as being related to a compromise where there were no communications whatever between the parties to that end.[36]

b. What Constitutes Offer or Part of Negotiations

Whether or not a statement constitutes an offer of compromise, or is sufficiently connected with compromise negotiations, must be determined in each case from the apparent intention of the parties.

It is often difficult to determine in a particular case what amounts to an ordinary admission and what constitutes an offer of compromise within the meaning of the general rule above stated; and the intention of the parties must be the guide in each case.[37] If the proposal is tentative, and any statements made in connection with it hypothetical, if the offer was made to "buy peace" and in contemplation of mutual concessions, it is as to such point a mere offer of compromise.[38] On the other hand,

Fair estimate of value

Where the amount named in an offer to accept a certain sum in settlement appears to have been arrived at against interest and not an attempt to compromise. Accordingly negotiations alleged to constitute all or part of an unsuccessful compromise treaty may be admitted as admissions of liability where it appears that they proceeded on the tacit assumption that the entire amount claimed was actually due,[41] or where there was no denial, express or implied, of liability and the only questions discussed were the amount to be paid,[42] the terms,[43] time,[44] or method[45] of payment, or whether the declarant shall be given some incidental advantage in consideration of payment.[46] So too, where there is no denial of liability, it may be competent to show that a party promised to do the fair thing,[47] or the right thing,[48] or to settle,[49] or adjust,[50] or make good,[51] failure to deny liability being the significant circumstance.[52] Likewise a suggestion of submitting the matter to arbitration has been held admissible;[53] but where an offer to arbitrate relates to the question of liability itself it is not competent as an admission,[54] and consent to the appointment of a referee or auditor involves no such admission of liability as to have evidentiary value.[55]

Pendency of action or controversy. The rule excluding offers of compromise or the negotiations comprising them applies as well where the offer was made before as after the commencement of the action.[56] However, there must be a contro-

Condemnation proceedings
(1) Where the law contemplates negotiations between the condemning party and the owner of property before condemnation proceedings are instituted, an unaccepted offer of compromise made pending such negotiations cannot be proved on the issue of value.—City of Greensboro v. Garrison, 130 S.E. 203, 190 N.C. 577—22 C.J. p 312 note 2 [a] (2).

(2) However, it has been held that an offer to sell land to a railroad before it is located should be regarded as an offer made before the controversy arose, and is properly admitted in a subsequent condemnation proceeding.—Kaufman v. Pittsburg, C. & W. R. Co., 60 A. 2, 210 Pa. 440—22 C.J. p 312 note 2 [a] (1).

versy between the parties at the time of the alleged offer. for if there is no controversy there is nothing to compromise.[57] Some authorities have even held, or at least intimated, that there must have been a disputed claim prior to the alleged offer;[58] but others have held that an offer made in recognition of an existing claim or controversy is within the rule even though such claim has not as yet been expressed.[59]

Connection of statement with compromise negotiations. Not every statement or admission made in connection with compromise negotiations is excluded, for, as appears infra in § 287, statements of independent facts so made are admissible, and certainly no statement or admission will be excluded because of compromise connections unless it appears to have been made as part of, and under the motivating influence of, compromise negotiations pending or contemplated at the time.[60] It is not, however, necessary that it should be expressly stated that what is said or written is on the faith of the compromise negotiations;[61] it is sufficient if this fact can be satisfactorily inferred from the circumstances under which the statement was made.[62] Thus, for example, the actual pendency of negotiations for a settlement[63] or the pendency of litigation[64] at the time the statement or admission is made is a circumstance warranting such an inference. Conversely, where no compromise negotiations appear to have been pending or contemplated, or where the circumstances actually negative their existence, or where the statements are not connected with or referable to any such negotiations, so that the statements appear to have been made by reason of their supposed truth, they are competent, and are not to be excluded merely because the party subsequently asserts that he intended to effect a compromise.[65] So a statement has been held ad-

"A controversy exists within the meaning of the rule whenever anything has transpired within the knowledge of the parties which has made the interests of the parties hostile. Even though no one has ever intimated that he claims a cause of action against the other, yet, if anything has happened which is calculated to produce litigation, the fact that one person offered to pay for a release of that possible cause of action and that the other refused to grant the release on such terms characterizes the transaction as an offer of compromise of an existing controversy, without proof of any previous claims or negotiations."—Starnes v. Subsequent offer
"Where a party makes admissions without regard to a compromise, and when it does not appear that any compromise or proposition to compromise is in view, the fact that she may afterwards propose that the parties compromise will not have a retroactive effect so as to prevent her independent admissions from being proved against her."—McBride v. Georgia R. & Electric Co., 54 S.E. 674, 125 Ga. 515.

Connection revealed by proffert of other evidence
Where evidence of offer of compromise had been excluded, plaintiffs' oral evidence on subject was properly rejected, since plaintiffs could not have their separate questions divorced from showing of whole transaction previously made.—Olshove v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 248 N.W. 906, 263 Mich. 579.

missible where it was made merely as an inducement to consent to open negotiations for compromise,[66] or before any compromise was discussed,[67] or after an attempt to effect a compromise had been abandoned;[68] when made by a person not seeking a compromise[69] of the matter before the court in the action,[70] or by a party who had consistently refused to compromise,[71] or by a person who could not settle the dispute;[72] when made while the declarant was discussing the liability of another;[73] or when the statement was made in connection with an attempt to compromise another claim not included in the action in which such statement is offered.[74] Although it has been held that a statement of fact or an admission cannot be excluded as having been part of compromise negotiations where no such negotiations were pending at the time it was made,[75] there is also authority for the view that, where a controversy actually exists, the fact that there have been no prior negotiations will not exclude a statement which itself constitutes the initial offer of compromise or overture of pacification.[76]

§ 286. Independent Relevancy of Offer

According to some authorities, an offer of compromise, although inadmissible to show an admission of liability, may be admissible as relevant circumstantial evidence to prove other facts; but other authorities hold that it is inadmissible to prove any fact entering the question of liability, or, indeed, for any purpose whatsoever.

According to some authorities, an offer of compromise, although inadmissible as an admission of liability, may be admissible as relevant circumstantial evidence to prove a fact other than that of liability,[77] such as due diligence,[78] waiver,[79] good

Conversation dealing with performance

Permitting seller's attorney to testify to conversation with defendant's agent as to seller's refusal to ship more seed until seed shipped was paid for was not error, it not referring to a settlement but to performance.—Lokey v. Rudy-Patrick Seed Co. of Kansas City, Mo.App., 285 S.W. 1028.

Denial of liability

In action for balance due on soda fountain, letter from defendant's agent denying liability was admissible as plaintiff's exhibit, against contention that letter was offer of compromise.—Krummenacher Drug Co. v. Chouteau, Mo.App., 296 S.W. 255.

Admission of liability

An admission of liability contained in an offer to settle in response to a demand for a settlement is not inadmissible as made with a view to a compromise when there is nothing to indicate that there has been any effort to compromise, and such effort cannot be inferred from the circumstances under which the offer was made.—Hening & Hagedorn v. Glanton, 108 S.E. 256, 27 Ga.App. 339.

That plaintiff submitted to physical examination in hope of effecting compromise is no objection to physicians' testimony as to result of examination.—Plater v. W. C. Mullins Const. Co., 17 S.W.2d 658, 223 Mo. App. 650.

Infant's suit

In a minor's action for personal injury, evidence tending to establish that his next friend had made an offer of compromise and settlement of the injury was held properly excluded on the ground that a next friend has no authority to settle or compromise an infant's suit without leave of court.—Rubin v. L. H. Trowbridge Sign Co., 122 A. 763, 99 N.J. Law 216.

Advice to compromise

Permitting evidence that deceased railroad employee's friend and coworker, who had no authority to act for the railroad in this matter, advised widow to compromise was held not error.—Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Lumpkins, 144 S.E. 485, 151 Va. 173.

Concealment of cause of action

In suit to require accounting of earnings of partnership, testimony concerning proposed compromise agreement between plaintiff and defendant was properly admitted as circumstance relating to question of concealment of cause of action, where defense was that action was barred by limitations.—Lake v. Wright, 53 S.W.2d 233, 186 Ark. 227.

Agency

Time limit for bringing suit

Evidence that negotiations were conducted for a considerable time is faith in asserting a claim[80] or in the performance of a contract,[81] reliance on an alleged promise,[82] or interest in the event of the suit.[83] However, it has been held that evidence of an offer of compromise is not only inadmissible as an admission of liability, but is equally inadmissible to prove any material fact entering the question of liability,[84] or to discredit a party as a witness,[85] or to contradict his testimony;[86] and it has even been said that such evidence is incompetent for all purposes.[87]

§ 287. Statement of Independent Facts

A statement or admission made apparently independently of the concessions involved in the proposed compromise, and purporting to be true rather than hypothetical, is admissible, provided it is separable from the offer.

Although, as appears supra § 285, when a statement or apparent admission is made only tentatively and hypothetically, in manifest contemplation of a compromise, and with a view to mutual concessions, it is inadmissible, where the statement or admission is made apparently independently of the concessions involved in the proposed compromise, and purports to be true rather than hypothetical, it is admissible,[88] provided it is not so integrated with an offer of compromise as to be inseparable from it.[89] The precise manner in which the statement or admission is related to the proposed compromise is immaterial; the rule applies equally where the statement directly relates or refers to a compromise offer,[90] or is made in connection therewith,[91] or accompanies it,[92] or was made pending

As proof of agency

In an action resulting from the negligence of an alleged agent, driver of defendant, evidence of an offer of a compromise settlement with plaintiff was inadmissible, even though offered to show that the driver was an agent as a circumstance of relationship and not for the purpose of fixing liability.—Sullins v. Farragut Tire & Battery Co., 234 S.W. 330, 144 Tenn. 491, overruling Lynde v. Browning, 2 Tenn.Civ.App. 262.

compromise negotiations.[93] To be independent within the rule the statement or admission must not involve the disputed facts forming the subject matter of the proposed compromise;[94] but it need not, of course, be independent of the subject matter of the controversy between the parties.[95]

The rule is frequently applied so as to admit admissions of liability;[96] and under it admissions of a variety of other facts have been admitted, such as, for example, admissions of possession of land in controversy,[97] an advance in the price of goods after the placing of an order,[98] the quantity of coal taken by a trespasser where the compromise involved only the amount to be paid,[99] and facts tending to show contributory negligence.[1] The rule has also been applied to permit the introduction of such matters as threats to give false testimony,[2] or suggestions of suppressing incriminating evidence,[3] of compounding a crime,[4] of marrying complainant in bastardy proceedings,[5] or of the party's ability to use indirect influences to divide the jury.[6]

In written communications. At least so much of a written communication as constitutes a statement of an independent fact may be admitted, although the communication also contains an offer of compromise,[7] unless the offer cannot be separated from the statements of fact,[8] but the irrelevant portion should be pointed out to the jury with instructions to disregard it.[9] It has been held, however, that where the communication is offered as a whole it may be excluded on objection, even though the statements of fact are separable from the offer of compromise.[10]

§ 288. Offer "Without Prejudice"

A party's admission made in the course of compromise negotiations, even though otherwise admissible, is not competent evidence against him where it is stated to be made without prejudice in those or equivalent words.

A party's admission of liability or of other facts in the course of negotiations for a compromise, even though otherwise admissible, as, for example, where it is a statement of an independent fact,[11] is not competent evidence against him, where the admission is expressly stated to be made without prejudice. The words "without prejudice" are not indispensable, an equivalent expression being equally efficacious,[12] and, indeed, an agreement not to make prejudicial use of an admission may be inferred from circumstances.[13] Of course, evidence of an offer of compromise which is plainly such is inadmissible even if it is not stated that it is made without prejudice,[14] for such offers are presumed to have been so made.[15]

§ 289. Functions of Court and Jury

Whether an offer or statement constitutes an offer of compromise or an inseparable part of one, or an independent admission, presents a preliminary question, which is ordinarily one for the court in the first instance, but if there is sufficient doubt the question may be submitted to the jury under proper instructions.

Before the competency of an offer or statement is passed on, the preliminary question of whether it is an offer of compromise or an inseparable part of one, or an independent admission, must be decided.[16] Ordinarily this question is, in the first instance, one for the court;[17] and where there is no doubt that the proffered statement was an offer of compromise, it is error to submit the question to the jury.[18] However, where the circumstances create a doubt as to the nature of the statement, the preliminary question is one of fact,[19] and if the case is being tried before a jury, the statement may,[20]

Where in a workman's compensation proceeding in which the court was the trier of facts, evidence was offered that claimant had offered to accept whatever the employer's insurer would pay in settlement, it was error to exclude such evidence as a matter of law; the court should have decided as a question of fact whether such offer amounted to an admission that claimant's case was groundless, and if he so found, should have made a ruling to such effect to protect the rights of the parties.—Gagne v. and, it has been held, should,[21] be received in evidence under instructions to the jury not to consider it if found to be a mere offer of compromise.

§ 290. Agreements for Compromise

It is usually considered that the rule excluding evidence of offers of compromise does not apply to a completed agreement for a compromise, and that such an agreement, unless for some reason void, is ordinarily admissible.

While it has been broadly stated that compromises, like offers of compromise, are not admissible in evidence,[22] as admissions of liability,[23] it is usually considered that the rule excluding evidence of offers of compromise does not apply to a completed agreement for a compromise, but such agreement may be shown,[24] where it is afterward repudiated by one of the parties,[25] unless it is for some reason void;[26] but an unsigned compromise agreement prepared by the party against whom it is sought to be introduced in evidence is not admissible.[27] The fact that a plaintiff has accepted a settlement of an action cannot be regarded as an admission that such action was without justification.[28] According to some authorities, proof of payment pursuant to a compromise agreement is inadmissible as an admission of liability for the claim compromised,[29] but there is authority to the contrary.[30] Of course, statements of independent facts contained in an agreement of compromise are admissible as admissions by the parties signing the agreement, in an action by or against a third person.[31]

§ 291. Admissions by Conduct

Evidence of prior conduct inconsistent with a contention advanced in litigation is admissible as being in the nature of an admission.

Where a party on the trial of an action advances contentions which are inconsistent with his prior conduct with relation to the matter in controversy, such prior conduct may be shown as being in the nature of an admission.[32]

32. U.S.—U. S. ex rel. Vajtauer v. Commissioner of Immigration at Port of New York, N.Y., 47 S.Ct.

Evidence of this character takes a wide range and may be received, for example, where the matter in controversy is the ownership,[33] value,[34] or control[35] of property; the existence of a relevant mental state,[36] such as assent[37] or lack thereof,[38] intent,[39] motive,[40] knowledge,[41] or recklessness;[42] or the existence of such matters as claim,[43] disclaimer,[44] fraud,[45] probable cause,[46] and ratification.[47]

However, the fact that goods have been sold under a distress warrant constitutes no admission of their ownership by any particular person.[48] Further a mere offer to return to dissatisfied customers the consideration received does not constitute an admission that the transaction was fraudulent.[49]

Reason for rule is that, as discussed in the C.J.S. title Landlord & Tenant § 681, also 36 C.J. p 549 note 31—p 553 note 3, a landlord is entitled to distrain for unpaid rent on any goods found on the premises, regardless of the ownership.—Sork v. Label, supra.

However, the mere failure to claim under insurance policies is not, as against the person inflicting the injuries, an admission that no injuries were suffered,[51] and an employee's failure to file a compensation claim is not, as against persons causing the injury, an admission of the termination of disability, particularly when the remedy against the persons causing the injury has been vigorously pursued.[52]

Flight. Defendant's flight from the scene of an accident is tantamount to an admission of responsibility.[53]

Hospital or medical care. The offer of a master to provide his injured servant with a nurse[54] or to pay the doctor's bills and wages of the servant during his incapacity[55] or to take care of him, coupled with advice not to have a member amputated,[56] does not tend to prove liability of the master for the injury; nor, in view of a statute prohibiting such effect, does payment of medical expenses of the employee constitute an admission of liability,[57] although if there is, or probably will be, evidence showing that the payment of medical expenses by the employer was made as an acknowledgment of liability evidence of the payment is admissible.[58] Hospitalization and nursing of an injured employee as emergency treatment cannot be treated as an admission that the injury occurred in the course of the employment within the meaning of workmen's compensation acts, either on the part of the employer or the insurer,[59] nor can payments by such insurer for emergency treatments constitute an admission of liability under the policy;[60] but the act of the employer in reimbursing the employee for medical expenditures is an admission of liability under such statutes.[61]

Where a person has been injured, the fact that another person took the injured person to a hospital and provided medical care,[62] or paid[63] or promised to pay[64] for such care, or otherwise enabled the injured person to obtain medical treatment,[65] does not constitute an implied admission of liability, unless the surrounding circumstances indicate an admission of liability rather than an act of benevolence.[66]

Payment. In an action by a wife for the death of her husband, evidence concerning the payment of compensation by defendant to the wife has been held to be admissible.[67]

While it has been held that payments to an employee constitute admissions that the employee is entitled to compensation,[68] unless such effect is prohibited by statute,[69] where the employer alleges that the employee was not injured while in the course of his employment, the fact of payment does not amount to an admission of injury in the course of the employment.[70]

Payment by an insured of premiums during a period of alleged total disability does not constitute

"It must be the impulse of every humane employer to provide this assistance for a disabled workman without means, and the rule of evidence ought to be such as to permit his doing it without danger to himself. an admission that the disability was merely temporary.[71] There is authority that whether a payment for injuries and an acceptance of a release actually was made is a question of fact for the trial court sitting as a jury.[72]

Evidence of part payment by a defendant insurer under a policy is admissible as an admission[73] of the existence of the policy,[74] its effectiveness at the time of the loss or injury,[75] the nature of the disability,[76] and of the amount of the employee's salary as a basis for the amount of compensation.[77] However, part payment of an employee's demand for compensation is not an admission of the employer's liability therefor when there is no obligation, express or implied, to make compensation.[78]

Payment of interest on commercial paper does not constitute an admission of liability for the principal where such payment is merely pursuant to an obligation plainly expressed in a written agreement.[79]

A tender of payment is an admission of liability.[80] Likewise, tender of a part of the amount claimed to be due as delinquent taxes constitutes an admission of a proper assessment, except as to equalization.[81]

Acceptance by an employee of a lesser wage than that claimed is an admission against interest.[82] Further, the receipt of sick benefits from other insurers constitutes an admission that the beneficiary was sick at the time of receiving the benefits.[83] However, the fact that a client has accepted the fruits of a judgment does not, as against the attorney's claim for compensation, amount to an admission that the damages were correctly assessed.[84]

Precautions taken to avoid loss by threatened litigation, as by obtaining a bond of indemnity,[85] efforts to buy off a conflicting claim,[86] offers to purchase perishable property before it spoils,[87] insuring one's self against liability for accidents,[88] transferring registration of an automobile to an unlicensed person,[89] or paying a mechanic in order to avoid the enforcement of a lien[90] are inadmissible for the reason that they imply no concession of liability.

Recognition of claim. In the case of a defendant it may be shown that his conduct has been such as to involve a recognition of the validity of the claim which he resists,[91] as by seeking a release from liability,[92] withdrawal from contesting,[93] or refusing to give his name without sufficient reason.[94] In addition, it may be shown that defendant's conduct involves a recognition of the validity of the claim by his doing something which indicates fear of an unsuccessful issue of litigation,[95] such as alienating property prior to a claim or suit but after the occurrence out of which the claim or action arose,[96] unless the transfer is for a valuable consideration,[97] or unless there is no relationship between the expected liability and the alienation.[98]

Further, where a defendant denies liability, it may be shown that he rested his defense on some other ground[99] or endeavored to gain time by promises of settlement.[1]

Repairs subsequent to accident. The making of repairs or similar conduct subsequent to an accident may not be shown as tending to prove a consciousness of negligence.[2] Evidence of repairs gratuitously made by a landlord is not admissible as an admission of a duty to make repairs,[3] although, where the evidence is conflicting as to whether the duty to keep premises in repair is imposed on the landlord or tenant by the terms of the lease, evidence of subsequent repairs by the landlord is admissible as in the nature of an admission of his duty to repair.[4]

Title to office or position. Where title to an office or position is in question, it may be shown, as against the incumbent, that he has discharged its duties;[5] and, conversely, where the question is whether a person is entitled to hold an office or position, the fact that a party has recognized such a right is as to him a competent fact.[6]

However, the fact that a person entitled to a position has taken examinations without obtaining a passing mark does not amount to an admission by him that such an examination is necessary to qualify for the position.[7]

Failure to file tax return as showing profits made

Omission of a business man to file an income tax return may be an admission that no profit was made.—Kregel v. Cirkler, 198 N.W. 664, 158 Minn. 175.

Failure to give statement as showing no consideration

Failure of a creditor to give a statement of account due when requested is admissible as tending to prove a want of consideration for the obligation.—Hale v. Herring, Tex.Civ.App., 102 S.W.2d 468.

Insulation of electric wire as establishing proper construction

Where an electric company insulated a high-tension wire line when it was installed, the fact of insulation may be considered as an admission that insulation was indicated as proper construction under the circumstances and may be considered on the question of its negligence to the public and persons rightly on street in failing to keep the insulation in good order.—Hickman v. Union Electric Light & Power Co., Mo., 226 S.W. 570.

New safeguards as admission of ineffectiveness of old

Change in the kind of safeguard used may involve an admission that the kind superseded is insufficient, which may be shown in an action for an accident subsequently happening at a place where the safeguard is of the kind superseded in similar places.—Stephenville, etc., R. Co. v. Schrank, Tex.Civ.App., 175 S.W. 471.

Recognition of relation

On an issue as to the existence of a definite relation it may be shown that a party has recognized its existence.—Harding v. St. Louis Nat. Stock Yards, 90 N.E. 205, 242 Ill. 444—22 C.J. p 319 note 83.

Reinstatement of policy as showing premiums paid

Insurer's reinstatement of life policy constituted admission of insurer tute[9] an admission.

Other acts and conduct as constituting or not constituting an admission are discussed elsewhere in this work, as, for example, retention of an account for an unreasonable time without objection see Account Stated § 37, and acceptance or procurement of a release see the C.J.S. title Release § 43, also 53 C.J. p 1245 notes 41–43.

§ 292. Settlements or Compromises with Third Persons

Evidence of payment of claims of third persons in the same position as a claimant is admissible as tending to show an admission, although evidence of settlements by a party of claims of other persons arising out of the same transaction, such persons being in the same position as the adverse party, is not admissible, except in unusual cases.

While the payment of the claims of other persons who are in the same position as claimant is not, of itself, an admission of liability,[10] nevertheless evidence of such payment is admissible as tending to show an implied admission of liability;[11] but, where the situation of the parties is different, evidence of payment is not admissible as an admission.[12]

A settlement between a party and a third person cannot be shown, even though it relates to the matters involved in the action and the person with whom the compromise was made was in the same position as the party seeking to show such settlement.[13] The rule above stated may be subject

Domestication of foreign corporation as doing business in state

Domestication of a foreign corporation in order to be enabled to sue does not amount to an admission that the corporation was doing business in the state of the forum.—Creamery Package Mfg. Co. v. Cheyenne Ice Cream Co., 100 P.2d 116, 55 Wyo. 277.

Execution of deed as establishing liability on note

Act of wife in joining husband in executing deed to payee of note is not a recognition of her liability thereon, where at the time she did not know her name was on note.—West Chester Sav. Bank of West Chester v. Dayton, 250 N.W. 695, 217 Iowa 64.

Failure to give notice

Where railroad has no knowledge of whom to notify of accident, evidence of failure to give notification is inadmissible.—Clark v. Columbia Ry., Gas & Electric Co., 108 S.E. 178, 117 S.C. 11.

Revocation of suspension as denoting suspension unjustified

Revocation of a suspension of a government employee is not admissible as an admission that the suspension was unjustified.—Goodwin v. City of Nashua, N.H., 18 A.2d 825.

§ 293. Attempts to Suborn Perjury or Suppress Evidence

Evidence of attempts to suborn perjury, suppress or destroy documentary evidence, or give false evidence is admissible as an admission, although the failure to produce evidence which the party cannot produce cannot be deemed an admission, and a failure to testify is not an admission where no duty to testify exists.

Evidence of a party's falsehood and all similar conduct is receivable against him as an indication of his consciousness that his case is weak or unfounded.[16]

An attempt to suborn perjury is evidence that the cause of the party by whom such attempt was made, or to whom it is attributable, is unjust,[17] or at least weak;[18] and the same is true of an attempt to persuade witnesses not to attend a trial or not to testify.[19] In addition, spoliation of documentary evidence constitutes an admission of the truth of the allegation of the opposite party.[20] Fur-

Advice of counsel

Where defendant's counsel informed an employee that it was the custom of employees as witnesses to claim a constitutional right against self-incrimination, but not as to the nature of the right of privilege, such advice is admissible as an admission that defendant's case is wrong or unjust.—Freeman v. Kansas City Public Service Co., Mo.App., 30 S.W.2d 176.

An attempt to persuade witnesses not to attend a trial or to refrain from testifying may be construed as an admission that the testimony of the witness would be unfavorable.

Presumptions arising from spoliation, fabrication, or nonproduction of evidence see supra §§ 151–156.

Reason for rule

The law, in consequence of the fraud practiced by the spoliation, will presume that the evidence destroyed will establish the other party's demand to be just.—Gaugh v. Gaugh, 11 S.W.2d 729, 321 Mo. 414, followed in Seehorn v. Gaugh, 11 S.W.2d 750, 321 Mo. 356—Haid v. Prendiville, 238 S.W. 452, 292 Mo. 552—Pomeroy v. Benton, 77 Mo. 64.

ther, the suppression[21] or destruction[22] of documents is in the nature of an admission that they are unfavorable to the party having control of them, and a similar result may attach to an attempt to prevent investigation.[23] Accordingly such matters may be shown as being in the nature of admissions.[24]

On the other hand, evidence of a failure to produce evidence not reasonably within the power of the party to produce is inadmissible as an admission.[25]

The failure of a party to testify does not amount to a positive admission of the truth of the evidence of the other party,[26] unless a duty to testify exists.[27] Likewise the failure to call a witness does not amount to a positive admission of the truth of the evidence which he might have been called to contradict.[28] A refusal to permit an autopsy after the body has been prepared by an undertaker for burial cannot be deemed an admission as to the cause of death.[29]

§ 294. Admissions by Silence or Acquiescence

Evidence of silence is admissible as evidence of an admission where the silence is improper or unnatural; and a definite statement of fact in connection with a total or partial failure to reply or in connection with acquiescence is, under certain conditions, allowed in evidence as an admission of the truth of the statement.

Evidence of silence may be, but is not necessarily, admissible as showing an admission.[30] If a person remains silent when silence is not proper or natural, evidence of such silence is admissible as evidencing an admission;[31] but evidence of silence when silence is natural and proper is not admissible as evidence of an admission.[32]

An unanswered statement which, although made in the presence of a party, is not connected with his conduct at the time when it was made, is mere hearsay and is not evidence against him of any

to the same extent as an express admission.[39] In some jurisdictions evidence of a declaration or act of another in the presence and within the observation of a party, together with evidence of the party's conduct with relation thereto, is expressly made admissible by statutes.[40] Where a number of statements are made under conditions that silence will be deemed an admission, the failure to answer a part of such statements constitutes an admission of their truth.[41] The rule as to admission by silence is inapplicable when a reply is made.[42]

Evasive answer. Evidence that a party was asked a question pertinent to the matter in controversy, and made an evasive answer is admissible as showing an admission.[43]

Acquiescence. Where a statement of a third person is adopted by another as his own, either expressly or by conduct, the truth of the statement will be deemed admitted.[44] Evidence that a statement was made to a party and that he acquiesced in it is admissible as an admission of the truth of the facts stated.[45]

Requisites of statements made. The fact of nondenial or other conduct being the essential element, it is comparatively immaterial by whom the statement itself is made.[46] Thus, where a statement of a deceased joint tenant is repeated by a surviving joint tenant without denial, such statement and lack of denial constitutes an admission against the surviving tenant.[47] Evidence of silence of a principal as to adverse statements made by his agent is admissible as an admission by the principal.[48] Likewise, where one spouse makes a statement, the silence or acquiescence of the other spouse is admissible as an admission against the latter, provided the requisite conditions are present,[49]

§ 295. Significance of Failure to Reply

a. In general
b. Statements in hearing or presence
c. Understanding of statement
d. Right of speaker to information

a. In General

In order that evidence of a failure to reply to a statement of fact may be admissible as an admission, a reply must be natural and proper and the party must have had knowledge and an opportunity sufficient to enable him to reply.

The failure of a party to reply to a statement made in his presence or hearing is significant only where the nature of the statement, and the circumstances under which it was made, are such as to render a reply natural and proper.[52] Where de-

Other explanation consistent with silence

"Inference of assent [from silence following a communication] may safely be made only when no other explanation is equally consistent with silence; and there is always another such explanation,—namely ignorance, or dissent—unless the circumstances are such that a dissent would in ordinary experience have been expressed, if the communication had not been correct."—Bednorzenski v. Schrager, 189 A. 690, 693, 124 Pa.Super. 486, quoting 2 Wigmore Evid. 2d ed.

Reason for rule

The rule rests on that universal principle of human conduct which leads us to repel an unfounded imputation or claim.
Ala.—Wheat v. Croom, 7 Ala. 349.
Cal.—Baldarachi v. Leach, 186 P. 1060, 44 Cal.App. 603.
Mich.—Donker v. Powers, 202 N.W. 989, 230 Mich. 237.

Effect of statute

Statutes providing that acquiescence or silence, when the circumstances require an answer or denial or other conduct, may amount to an admission have been construed to mean that acquiescence or silence will not amount to an admission unless the circumstances require an answer or denial.—English v. Moore, 110 S.E. 737, 28 Ga.App. 265.

Evidence of demand for the money sued for, to which no reply is made, is admissible when the demand was made under such circumstances that a reply would ordinarily be made.—Sonnesyn v. Hawbaker, 148 N.W. 476, 127 Minn. 15.

Circumstances not calling for reply

(1) Advice to plaintiff to kick defendant.—Baird v. Bureman, 26 P.2d 272, 138 Kan. 381.

(2) Accusations by an injured child that defendant caused the injuries, made while being taken to a hospital in a car in which defendant was riding, while his parents were with fendant denies liability, it may be shown that he made no denial on a particular occasion when a denial would have been natural.[53] Silence or acquiescence of a party may be shown where the facts stated tend to expose him to the consequences of a criminal act,[54] or would inflict a civil injury,[55] or injuriously affect his title to real[56] or personal[57] property, or limit his right to recover damages for a serious injury,[58] as under such circumstances it would be reasonable to expect a denial of the statement if it was not true. Further, if a party testifying or being able to testify has an adequate opportunity to controvert testimony previously heard by him, the fact of nondenial is admissible.[59]

On the other hand, no admission can be implied from silence where the failure to answer was caused by constraint,[60] or the party was not aware at the time that he had an interest,[61] or believed that he had no interest,[62] or was only indirectly affected,[63] or where, as the matter was presented, he had no interest to object,[64] for example, where the statement was not addressed to the party[65] or was in his favor.[66] It has also been held that no probative weight can be attached to the failure of a husband to deny statements of his wife where his conduct may fairly be attributed to considerations of domestic harmony.[67]

Knowledge of party. In order that any significance may attach to the failure of a party to reply to a statement he must have been possessed of knowledge concerning the subject matter of the statement sufficient to enable him to reply if he was inclined to do so.[68]

Opportunity for reply. Where no opportunity is available to reply to a statement, silence is not evidence of an admission of the truth of the statement.[69] him, and while obviously suffering great pain.—Donker v. Powers, 202 N.W. 989, 230 Mich. 237.

(3) Statement by bystander that plaintiff fainted, the remark not impugning her motives or character.—Hines v. Patterson, 225 S.W. 642, 146 Ark. 367.

(4) Creditor's failure to reply to debtor's statement at a chance meeting on a street that he would protect creditor to certain amount did not justify inference that sum named was all due.—Platts v. Thompson, 268 P. 833, 126 Kan. 544.

(5) Where plaintiff, who claimed that defendant had breached its agreement to extend credit to a corporation in which both were interested, stated, in reply to defendant's inquiry as to why a receiver had been appointed, that it was because defendant did not live up to his contract.—Pulver v. Union Inv. Co., C.C.A.Minn., 279 F. 699.

(6) A motorist who struck pedestrian at an intersection was under legal and moral duty to render assistance to injured pedestrian and was not required to enter into verbal combat with bystanders as to who was to blame for accident, at risk of having his silence construed as an admission of fault.—Beck v. Dye, 92 P.2d 1113, 200 Wash. 1, 127 A.L.R. 1022.

(7) Other cases see Pond v. Pond, 65 A. 97, 79 Vt. 352, 8 L.R.A.,N.S., 212—22 C.J. p 322 note 46 [a].

Suffering preventing reply

(1) Even though statements naturally requiring a reply are made in

Interruption of orderly proceeding. The doctrine of silence or acquiescence as constituting an admission does not apply in case of statements made in judicial proceedings where an answer would be an unseemly interruption of the proceedings in progress,[70] as in case of testimony in open court,[71] or the discharge by a judge,[72] counsel,[73] or other person,[74] of his proper functions in court proceedings.[75]

Similarly, the doctrine of silence or acquiescence does not apply to statements made in the course of sermons.[76]

b. Statements in Hearing or Presence

Evidence of a failure of a party to reply to a statement of fact cannot be deemed an admission unless the statement was made in his hearing or presence.

In order that evidence of silence may be admissible as an admission it is essential that the statement of fact be made in the hearing of the party.[77] Further, in order that any significance may attach to a party's failure to reply to a statement, generally it must be made to appear that he actually heard it;[78] a statement is not admissible where the party sought to be affected thereby was unable to hear it, as where he was deaf[79] or unconscious.[80] The mere fact that the party was within hearing distance of the speaker is not sufficient,[81] unless the situation was such that he must necessarily have heard.[82]

On the question of probability that a party heard a statement it is proper to consider such matters as the loudness of tone in which the statement was made,[83] intervention of partitions between the speaker and the party,[84] and whether the party was listening[85] or was employed about other matters.[86]

Presence. It has been broadly stated that, where other conditions are present, the failure of a party to deny a statement made in his presence may be deemed an admission.[87] On the other hand, silence the presence of a party, when the party is suffering great pain or shock and does not reply, evidence of the silence is not admissible as an admission.

as to a statement made out of the party's presence, even when heard by the party, has been held not to amount to an admission.[88]

Evidence that conversations between third parties, not in the party's presence, were reported to the party who failed to reply thereto has been held to be admissible as an admission,[89] although there is contrary authority.[90]

c. Understanding of Statement

Evidence of the failure of a party to reply to a statement of fact is inadmissible as an admission unless the party understood the statement.

In order that a party's conduct with reference to a statement may be relevant as an admission, it is necessary that he should have understood the statement.[91] Therefore, a statement which was made in a language of which the party was ignorant or with which he was not familiar is not competent.[92]

d. Right of Speaker to Information

Evidence of a failure of a party to reply to a statement of fact is inadmissible as an admission where the statement is made by a person who is not entitled to the information sought.

It has been held that evidence of silence of a person in whose hearing a statement of fact is made is inadmissible as an admission where the speaker has no right to information on the subject,[93] as in cases where the failure to reply might fairly be attributed to a mere disinclination to discuss personal affairs with strangers.[94]

On the other hand, an obligation to reply exists where it appears that the party addressed must have known that the speaker would alter his position in the event of nondenial,[95] or where the party addressed is under obligation to afford to the speaker correct information regarding the subject matter of the declaration.[96]

§ 296. Determination as to Admissibility

Preliminary questions relating to admissions by silence or acquiescence are for the court, such as the question whether a reply to a statement was required; it is for the jury to decide whether the party heard or understood the statement.

Whether the situation was one from which the jury may reasonably find a party's conduct relevant to a fact in issue is a preliminary question for the court,[97] to be determined in view of the evidence in the case, direct or circumstantial;[98] for a person is not at liberty to make evidence for himself by the simple expedient of saying something to his opponent and then supporting the truth of his statement by proof that it was not denied.[99] Silence or acquiescence is a species of evidence to be received with caution;[1] and it is essential that the fact of silence or acquiescence be established prior to the admission of the statement.[2] It is for the court to determine as a preliminary question whether the circumstances were such as reasonably to require a party to reply to a statement addressed to him.[3]

On the other hand, it is for the jury to decide whether the party actually heard[4] and could understand[5] the statement.

§ 297. In Respect to Written Statements

a. In general
b. Letters and telegrams

a. In General

The doctrine of admission by silence or acquiescence applies to written statements.

Where it is affirmatively shown, by either direct or circumstantial evidence, that a writing or document has been brought to the attention of a party,[6] and the circumstances are such that, if the party dissented from the statements contained therein, his dissent would naturally have been manifested by some objection,[7] his failure to deny the accuracy thereof may be relevant as an admission, and hence the writing and the failure to object thereto may be shown in evidence.[8] Evidence of the failure to deny the truth of written statements is especially admissible where other statements in the same document are disputed.[9]

However, in order that failure to correct a written statement should be a relevant fact, it must appear that some duty exists to make corrections and some power to do so; mere access to the books is not sufficient,[10] and simply disregarding a claim leaves the positions of the parties entirely unaffected.[11] Where all liability is denied, no inference of acquiescence in the correctness of amounts charged can be drawn from failure to object to them specifically.[12]

Particular writings. Under the rule stated supra this section that the failure to deny the accuracy of a written statement may be relevant as an admission, it may be competent to show the contents of, or statements contained in, accounts or reports of sales,[13] particularly where the parties meet to scrutinize and adjust them;[14] affidavits;[15] bills of

(1) When evidence is merely corroborative of direct statements by the party, defendant's evidence that defendant in plaintiff's presence made certain statements as to circumstances of accident is properly excluded in absence of preliminary showing that plaintiff in some way assented to such statements, since offer of such evidence was not broad enough to show its competency.—McCarty v. Bishop, 102 S.W.2d 126, 231 Mo.App. 604.

(2) Question asking plaintiff if she had not heard defendant make a statement to a third party concerning the circumstances of the collision is properly excluded, where plaintiff was not asked whether she had denied such statement, since preliminary showing of plaintiff's assent to such statement was requisite, especially where conflicting evidence as to similar statement made by plaintiff had already been admitted.—McCarty v. Bishop, supra.

Absence of duty

The exclusion of a notice of a mortgage sale of logs, reciting that they were marked "J," and testimony of an officer serving same, offered to establish such marking on the theory that failure to protest constituted an admission of the truth of its recitals, was not error, there being no call for any protest to the officer serving same.—Reichel v. sale;[16] book entries;[17] invoices;[18] lists of rents;[19] notices to quit;[20] promissory notes;[21] receipts;[22] recitals in a resolution of the board of directors of a corporation;[23] reports of agents[24] or lessees;[25] and signs.[26]

However, evidence of a failure to object to an itemized statement of damages, coupled with a reference to the person's attorneys, is not admissible as an admission of the correctness of the statement.[27]

Newspaper statement. Failure to deny a newspaper statement is not ordinarily regarded as an admission of its truth,[28] although it has been held that, where a newspaper item is shown to the party with respect to whom it makes certain statements, and, on reading it, he makes no reply, this circumstance may be received in evidence.[29]

Acquiescence. Where there is an express acquiescence in a written statement, evidence of such statement and acquiescence is admissible as an admission.[30] Likewise, book entries have been held admissible as admissions where the party has adopted the entries as correct by the receipt of benefits based thereon.[31]

However, no admission by acquiescence results where the parties do not intend that their conduct should have such effect.[32]

b. Letters and Telegrams

As a general rule the doctrine of admission by silence is inapplicable where the statement of fact is contained in a letter or telegram, but where a reply would be natural and proper the doctrine of admission by silence may apply and a statement contained in a letter or telegram may be independently relevant for other reasons.

Under ordinary circumstances, the mere fact that one received a letter containing false statements of fact does not impose on him any obligation to reply thereto, and hence as a general rule an omission to answer a written communication has no probative value as tending to show an admission of the truth of the matters stated therein,[33] especially where the party failing to reply has taken a final position in the matter in dispute, or for some other reason the correspondence has ended because no advantage could be deemed likely to accrue from further correspondence.[34]

mission by silence as to the statements therein contained.[35]

The test of admissibility of letters as admissions is found in whether the circumstances are such that in the ordinary practice of mankind the party receiving the letter would have answered it if he did not acquiesce in the statements contained therein.[36] A failure to reply may be a relevant fact where the party receiving a letter has in any way invited it,[37] or where there is any ground to infer that he has acted on it[38] by partly answering[39] or otherwise recognizing it,[40] or where, with such letter, goods or other articles are forwarded with bills, and these are received without return or protest,[41] or where money is sent on terms and conditions stated in the letter and is not returned and there is no objection to, or denial of, the statements contained in the inclosing writing.[42] Further, a dunning letter written to a debtor and incidentally stating the terms of the contract under which the money is alleged to be due has been held admissible in connection with a failure to reply;[43] and where a letter from one party to a contract to the other shows that the writer places a different construction on the contract than does the other party, the latter's silence has been held to constitute an acquiescence in such construction.[44] In order that letters may be admissible in connection with the absence of a denial it is essential that the evidence be properly offered.[45]

Letters addressed to a party are not of themselves competent evidence against him,[46] unless they are shown to have been received by him,[47] and then only in connection with his reply[48] or his other conduct with respect to the letter.[49]

Telegrams are subject to the same rules in this respect as letters.[50] A telegram may be admissible under the same circumstances as would warrant the admission of a letter containing the same statements.[51]

Incompetency of written statement. Where a letter received is itself incompetent as evidence, the failure of a party to reply thereto does not render the writing admissible as an admission in connection with the absence of a reply,[52] and the same is true in the case of a letter incompetent in evidence which is followed by a letter acknowledging its receipt and containing references to it.[53]

However, a letter incompetent as evidence may be rendered admissible as an admission when coupled with acquiescence by the recipient as to the truth of the statements contained therein.[54]

Independent relevancy. A letter, the statements of which are not competent in connection with nondenial or other conduct of the party, may still be relevant for other reasons,[55] as, for example, to prove demand[56] or notice.[57]

§ 298. Time, Place, and Surrounding Circumstances

The time and place of the making of an extrajudicial admission ordinarily do not affect the question of admissibility.

The time and place of the making of an extrajudicial admission and the circumstances surrounding the admission bear only on its weight and not on its competency as evidence,[58] except where it is sought to use the admissions of one person against another, in which case the time of the admission becomes material as bearing on whether the declarant, at the time of making the statement, could, by his statements, affect the party against whom the evidence is offered.[59]

C. JUDICIAL ADMISSIONS

§ 299. In General

A judicial admission may be made in any judicial proceeding, and is competent as evidence in the same case or in another action. Unless it is withdrawn it is binding on the parties, counsel, and court. The matter of its withdrawal or modification is largely within the control of the court.

A judicial admission, as defined supra § 270, may be made in any judicial proceeding, including proceedings in probate courts[60] and in bankruptcy.[61] So far as its competency in evidence is concerned, the admission may be made either in the case in which it is sought to be used,[62] such as on a former trial of the case,[63] or it may be made in some other action or judicial proceeding,[64] the record of the former action being admissible for the purpose of establishing the admission;[65] and this rule applies regardless of whether the other action was at law or in equity,[66] and although the party seeking to use the admission was not served with process in the former action.[67] However, with respect to conclusiveness, as explained infra § 381, an admission made in another case does not have the same force as a judicial admission in the same case, but is regarded as being in the nature of an extrajudicial admission.[68] A judicial admission does not apply as to facts which, at the time thereof, have become nonexistent.[69]

Where position of parties changed
Admitting documents in another case in which present defendant was codefendant with plaintiff, as admis-

Unless withdrawn, a judicial admission is binding on the parties,[70] and counsel,[71] and even on the court itself,[72] except as to matters of law.[73]

Discretion of court as to receipt or withdrawal. Judicial admissions relate to procedure,[74] and accordingly it is largely within the administrative control and discretion of the court to determine all matters relating to their receipt,[75] withdrawal, explanation, or modification,[76] and enforcement.[77] The court may, in its discretion, permit a judicial admission to be withdrawn as having been made by mistake or improvidently,[78] but, as has been said, such discretion should be exercised cautiously, as a withdrawal is not favored.[79]

A party is not required to accept a judicial admission of his adversary, but may insist on proving the fact.[80]

Availability of other evidence of the fact does not affect the admissibility of a judicial admission, but it may be received, although declarant is an available witness or even present in court.[81]

a. In General

A judicial admission may be made orally or in writing, or it may be implied from the conduct of the party.

The precise form which the admission may assume is immaterial, as any act or statement which may fairly be interpreted as an admission against interest on a material matter of court inquiry may be shown in evidence.[82] A judicial admission may be oral, as a verbal waiver of proof made in open court,[83] a withdrawal of a contention,[84] or a disclosure made before the court;[85] or it may be in writing, as in pleadings, as explained infra §§ 301–306, depositions, infra § 308, stipulations, infra § 307, instructions,[86] the endorsement of a summons,[87] a report[88] or inventory[89] submitted by an executor or administrator, the appraisal of an estate,[90] statements submitted by a guardian,[91] an inventory[92] or schedule[93] filed in bankruptcy proceedings, or bankruptcy records;[94] or it may be implied from the conduct of the party.[95] A letter, written to an auditor to whom a case has been referred, and containing an admission of fact, may properly be used

Admission of title
(1) Claim of title under grant from commonwealth was admission of title in commonwealth at time of grant.—James River & Kanawha Power Co. v. Old Dominion Iron & Steel Corporation, 122 S.E. 344, 138 Va. 461.

(2) Claimant's claim of title by voluntary deed from defendant in execution, executed prior to loan deed foreclosed by plaintiff, constituted admission of title in defendant.—Moore v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 168 S.E. 48, 176 Ga. 489.

Application by guardian for permission to invest ward's funds is admission, in suit by children against administratrix of their father, who had been their guardian, to establish their claim to land on ground that guardian had used their funds to pay for or to improve it.—Hardy v. Hardy, 100 S.E. 101, 149 Ga. 371.

Acts or statements held not admissible as admissions

Instructions held not admissions
(1) An instruction for defendant, on a prior trial, that plaintiff was entitled to recover nominal damages only, is not admissible as an admission that plaintiff is entitled to recover.—National Warehouse & Storage Co. v. Toomey, supra.

(2) An offered instruction by defendant as to the determination of the value of goods destroyed is not an admission that if plaintiff, as seller, had not arbitrarily fixed the price on such goods, the value might be established by plaintiff's selling price.—International Harvester Co. of America v. Appearance and participation in trial Appearance of defendants and their participation in trial of action of unlawful entry and detainer is an admission in absence of evidence to contrary, that they were withholding land from plaintiff—Huff v. Murray, 158 So. 475, 171 Miss. 656.

Delay in pleading contract
That agreement under which defendant claimed property was not pleaded until during trial, was not suspicious circumstance sufficient to impeach verity of instrument pleaded.—Bibler v. Bibler, 216 N.W. 99, 205 Iowa 639.

Failure to allege damages
In death action, failure of one defendant, injured in accident involved, to allege damages, was not admission of his negligence, as such allegation would have been simply averment of legal conclusion.—Jayne, Occidental Indemnity Co., Intervener, v. Morck, Cal.App., 111 P.2d 696.

Failure to contradict affidavit
Where shortly after action was commenced by employee for wrongful discharge, employee moved for summary judgment and in opposition employer presented its officer's affidavit wherein officer swore that he and employee had made oral agreement canceling employment contract, and employee in replying affidavit stated that if officer's version were true alleged agreement of cancellation was legally invalid, exclusion of the two affidavits offered by employer at trial on theory that employee's failure squarely to contradict the officer was a virtual admission of making of rescission agreement was not error, since, on motion for summary judgment, employee had no reason to contradict the officer.—Sanders v. Schenley Products Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 108 F.2d 23.

Refusal to produce document as not admission
City's refusal in response to notice, to produce documents of title on ground that they were not relevant nor material on hearing for temporary injunction to prevent encroachment on street, did not amount to admission that city did not have title, nor relieve plaintiff of burden of showing such fact.—Dure v. City of Macon, 127 S.E. 142, 159 Ga. 875.

by the auditor in making his decision,[96] but a letter from one party to another does not rise to the dignity of a judicial admission.[97] Where the only ground of an objection to the introduction of an assignment is that it is inadmissible because made after the action was instituted, the objection is, in effect, a concession of the assignment.[98] However, a failure to disprove an allegation of the opposing party is not an admission thereof,[99] and a statement in open court that certain allegations of a complaint are admitted by not answering does not amount to an admission of statements which amount to conclusions of the pleader.[1] So, also, a statement by defendant's attorney, in an action involving a disputed boundary, that no evidence would be introduced to dispute the location of certain stones, was not an admission that the stones were correctly located.[2] A motion on behalf of plaintiff for the filing of the contract "whereon his cause of action is based," which is not submitted during, or for the purposes of, the trial, but merely to secure possession and inspection of the contract in preparation for the trial, is not a judicial admission that the cause of action is based solely on an express contract.[3] The action of defendant in filing his answer, and offering it as a standard for comparison of handwriting, cannot be considered as an admission by plaintiff of the genuineness of the signature or as an estoppel which will prevent him from denying it.[4]

Notices. A notice served pursuant to statutory requirements may be competent as an admission.[5]

Forthcoming or release bond. A competent admission may be contained in a forthcoming[6] or release[7] bond given in attachment proceedings; or it may be contained in a replevin bond.[8]

b. Admissions in Criminal Cases

Admissions by defendant in a criminal case, as where he enters a plea of guilty, are competent as evidence in a civil action by him involving the same subject matter.

Admissions by defendant in a criminal case may be competent as judicial admissions, against him, in a civil action involving the same subject matter.[9] Where defendant has pleaded guilty to a criminal charge, such as for assault or battery, evidence of the fact of such plea,[10] although the plea was sub-

"A plea of guilty to a charge of crime is in the nature of an admission. It is an admission of wrong on the part of a defendant so pleading. The jury are therefore entitled to consider it as it considers any other admission; they must view it in connection with the surrounding circumstances, and give it such weight as in their judgment the circumstances warrant."—Konshuk v. Hayes, 273 P. 957, 958, 150 Wash. 565.

There must be an unequivocal statement that an act indicating an unwillingness to contend is consistent with a belief that there is no liability and cannot be used as an admission.—Harrison v. Baker, 5 Litt., Ky., 250.

In accident case

(1) In a motor vehicle accident case, defendant's plea of guilty to a criminal charge for negligent or reckless driving, is admissible as an admission against interest.

sequently withdrawn,[11] or the record of his conviction on the plea of guilty,[12] may be introduced, in a civil action, as an admission on his part against interest, and is also admissible in rebuttal to contradict defendant.[13] This rule, admitting such an admission, does not apply where defendant, when making the plea, was not sufficiently apprised of the charge against him.[14] A plea of guilty, in a federal court, is competent as an admission in a civil action in a state court, although the matter charged is not an offense against a federal law.[15] Defendant's dismissal of an appeal from a conviction on a plea of not guilty, does not constitute a plea of guilty, so as to make the transcript competent, as an admission, in a civil case involving the same facts.[16]

A plea of "nolo contendere" is an admission of guilt only for the purposes of the case and cannot be used as an admission in a civil case for the same act, as stated in Criminal Law § 425.

§ 301. Pleadings

A constructive admission, as by a failure to deny a traversable allegation, has slight probative value; but a distinct statement of facts in a pleading is admissible, unless, in some states, the pleading is unverified.

A constructive admission,[17] as by failure to deny a traversable allegation,[18] has slight, if any, probative value, although, so far as necessary to effectuate its purpose, it is, even if not offered in evidence,[19] conclusive on the specific issue to which it applies,[20] unless or until changed by amendment or otherwise.[21] However, a distinct statement of

Exclusion of evidence of plea

It has been held that, where no offense was shown to have been committed which justified an arrest, the exclusion of evidence, in an action for false imprisonment, that plaintiff had pleaded guilty before a magistrate is not reversible error.—Larson v. Feeney, 162 N.W. 275, 196 Mich. 1, L.R.A.1917D 694.

Reckless driving

In action based on a statute making operator of automobile liable to guest where accident was result of operator's reckless disregard of rights of others, exemplified copy of court record allegedly showing that operator had been arrested and charged with reckless driving after accident and had pleaded guilty is inadmissible as admission to establish liability under statute, where the statutes make a distinction between recklessness endangering and that not endangering life and limb and indefiniteness of record as to which offense operator had pleaded guilty.—Sothern v. facts which is material and competent,[22] and which is contained in a pleading, and apparently relied on because actually existing, is admissible, as a judicial admission,[23] although the statement is voluntary and unnecessary[24] or does not bear on the plea on which the issue is tried,[25] and although the pleading was filed by a party without the knowledge of his attorney.[26] It is essential that the statement be against the interest of the pleader,[27] and that it be not merely a statement of a legal conclusion.[28]

Such a statement in a verified pleading may, of course, be introduced as an admission;[29] but some authorities hold that such a statement is admissible regardless of whether or not the pleading is signed or verified,[30] although the effect of the pleading as evidence must be determined from the circumstances under which it was made,[31] and verification adds to the probative force of the admission.[32] Other authorities, however, regard unsigned or unverified pleadings as merely statements of the party's counsel, and for that reason consider them inadmissible.[33] Another statement of the rule is that the pleading is competent against the party if he signed it or otherwise acquiesced in the statements contained therein.[34]

One who desires to avail himself of admissions in a pleading must accept them as an entirety; he cannot select such portion as may suit him and reject

Solemn admissions. Admissions in a pleading are sometimes termed solemn admissions.[41]

§ 302. In Same Case

Statements in a pleading are generally admissible against the party making them or his successor in the litigation, on any subsequent trial of the case.

As stated in Corpus Juris, which has been cited and quoted with approval, statements in a pleading which are satisfactorily shown to be those of the party[42] or to have been approved by him[43] are admissible against the party making them or his successor in the litigation,[44] as proof of the facts admitted therein, on any trial of the case subsequent to the making of such statements,[45] including a trial in an appellate court.[46] Such statements are equally competent whether the pleader is plaintiff,[47] or whether he is defendant,[48] as in case of admissions in an affidavit of defense, as a pleading,[49] or in a counterclaim or cross bill.[50]

Statements in an answer, however, cannot be used as admissions in support of plaintiff's case, where the answer interposes a general denial,[51] and this rule applies in case of a general denial of a cross action.[52] A statement in an answer also cannot be used as an admission in the original proceedings, where it controverts a new issue raised by a supplemental and amended petition;[53] and an admission or statement under one allegation is not admissible where inconsistent defenses are pleaded.[54] Where the substance of two petitions is the same, so that both petitions can be considered as one, an answer to the first petition is an answer to both, and the averments of the second petition are inadmissible.[55] The pleadings of both parties may be admitted where the introduction of one pleading is necessary to make clear the admissions in the other.[56] Under some statutes, pleadings are not evidence on the trial and hence statements therein cannot be shown as admissions.[57]

Failure to deny an allegation may be used in some instances as a so-called "admission by conduct."[58] Under the express provisions of some statutes, an allegation of fact in plaintiff's statement of claim, which is not denied in the affidavit of defense, shall be taken to be admitted.[59]

or more distinct counts or pleas, and the issue on each is separately tried, an allegation in one cannot be taken as an admission of a fact distinct from the proof of the issue on that one.[60]

An inconsistency in the statement of the facts, in different counts of a declaration, is not evidence of an admission of plaintiff that the facts are not as stated by him in his testimony on the trial of the cause.[61] A prior inconsistent pleading, however, setting out a different state of facts may be used to discredit the present claim of a party.[62]

c. Independent relevancy

a. In General

An admission in a pleading in one action may be received in evidence against the pleader or his successor in interest on the trial of another action to which he is a party, in favor of a party to the latter action, provided the admission is relevant and material to the issues involved in such action.

It is well established that an admission contained in a pleading in one action may be received in evidence against the pleader on the trial of another action,[63] the rule in this respect being the same whether the actions are both at law, both in eq-

Admission in bill of particulars

Okl.—Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Mashore, 96 P. 630, 21 Okl. 275, 17 Ann.Cas. 277.

Wife's divorce bill filed several years after her husband's disappearance may be deemed an admission that she then believed him to be alive, and is admissible as such an admission in an action by her for insurance for his death.—Ledger v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 241 N.W. 803, 258 Mich. 26.

Motion for security for costs as not admission

Where a sheriff joins in a motion for security for costs in an action of replevin, after accepting a delivery bond, moving "the court to rule the plaintiff to give security for the costs already accrued and thereafter to accrue in the above entitled cause, for the reason that plaintiff has not sufficient property subject to execution out of which the officers of the court could levy their costs," it is uity, or one in equity and the other at law.[64] It is not essential that both actions should be in the same court,[65] but admissions made in the pleadings filed in a federal court are competent in a state court, and vice versa;[66] nor is a pleading filed in another action rendered inadmissible by the fact that such action was brought in a state other than that in which it is sought to use the pleading as evidence.[67] Indeed it is not even necessary that the court in which the pleading was filed should have had jurisdiction of the action in which it was filed.[68]

It is, however, essential that the statements in the pleading should be relevant and material to the issues involved in the action in which it is sought to be used,[69] although it is not necessary that the offer should be limited to the parts of the pleading containing the admissions, where the remainder is not prejudicial.[70]

A statutory provision that the pleadings shall not be evidence on the trial applies only to the trial of the case in which the pleadings are filed, and does not prevent an admission in a pleading being introduced in the trial of another case.[71]

Nature of statement. The statement must be precise and definite.[72] A failure to answer the allegations of a petition may constitute an admission of their truth available in another action,[73] unless the petition was dismissed before the time for answering had expired.[74] Where a judgment has been entered by default, the essential allegations of the claim on which the judgment was entered are admissible in another proceeding as evidence of an admission by silence.[75] An answer which denies each and every allegation of the complaint, but consents to a settlement without trial, is not admissible as an admission against interest.[76]

76. Ariz.—Schneider v. McAleer, 4 P.2d 903, 39 Ariz. 190.

A statement on information and belief has been held not competent as an admission,[77] but there is high authority for the contrary view.[78]

In whose favor admissible. The rule that pleadings in another action may be shown as admissions is, of course, applicable where the parties to the action in which it is sought to use such pleadings as evidence are the same as in the former action.[79] However, such identity of parties is not essential; the former pleading is admissible even though the party who introduces it in evidence was a stranger to the action in which it was filed.[80]

Against whom admissible. The allegations in the pleadings in the prior action are competent as admissions, not only against the pleader, as stated supra, but also against his privies or successors in interest in the present action.[81] As a general rule, however, allegations in a pleading in another action are not admissible in evidence against a person who was not a party to the other action;[82] and they are not admissible in a proceeding between parties, none of whom claim under the pleader, and to which proceeding the pleader is not a party.[83] Statements in the pleadings of one defendant are not admissible against his codefendant.[84] A petition, in another action against defendant by a third person, who is not a party to the present proceeding, is not admissible as an admission against plaintiff.[85]

b. Responsibility for Statement

A pleading in another action, generally, is admissible against the pleader where it is authenticated by his signature or verified by his oath, or where the statements therein are such that information in respect thereto must have come to the attorney from his client.

A pleading in another action is admissible against the party in whose behalf it was filed, where it is authenticated by his signature,[86] or that of his authorized agent or attorney;[87] or where it is verified by the party's oath,[88] although he testifies that he signed and swore to the pleading without reading it;[89] or where the statements contained therein are of such a nature that information with respect to the facts set forth could have come to the attorney only from his client,[90] or the record shows that the pleader's agent, when drafting the pleading, had access to the original sources of information.[91]

It has been held that a party is bound by admission contained in a pleading prepared by his attorney, although he did not swear to or know of the statements therein,[92] and even though he had no actual knowledge of the existence of the pleading.[93] However, the generally accepted view recognizes a distinction between statements contained in a pleading in another case which can fairly be regarded as statements by the party, and those which are inadmissible as being merely emanations of counsel,[94] as where the party has not signed or verified the pleading,[95] or is not shown to have knowledge thereof.[96] Under this view, it is required as a condition of admissibility, that the statement be affirmatively connected with the party as one which he has made because it was true,[97] such as that the pleading be drawn by his direction and the statement therein be made with his assent or under his direction.[98]

In statements setting out specific cause of action or defense, the attorney presumably is acting under special authorization of his client.—

A pleading in another action, alleging facts inconsistent with the pleader's present contention, is admissible although it is not verified by the witness testifying.[99]

c. Independent Relevancy

Statements made in a former pleading may be competent as evidence apart from their character as admissions.

Statements made in a former pleading may be competent evidence apart from their character as admissions,[1] for example, they may be competent to show that an action was brought[2] and its general nature,[3] or that the issues in two actions are the same,[4] provided the record affirmatively shows relevancy in the statements offered.[5] In like manner these statements are admissible to show that a former position was inconsistent with the one taken later;[6] that the amount claimed in two actions is different;[7] that a party has failed to advance a present claim under suitable circumstances;[8] that a defense, entirely obvious if true, was not suggested at an earlier stage;[9] or that a party has suffered a default, when if certain facts were true he probably would not have done so.[10]

§ 304. Abandoned or Superseded Pleadings

Statements in a pleading which has been abandoned, or superseded by amendment, may be competent as admissions against the pleader, where they are material and relevant to the issues in connection with which they are sought to be introduced; and they may also be independently relevant to prove some fact connected with the case.

Although a pleading which has been withdrawn or stricken out or superseded by amendment is out of the case in its capacity as a pleading, so that the pleader is no longer concluded by it, and statements therein cease to be judicial admissions,[11] they still remain as statements seriously made and are admissible in evidence, on behalf of the opposite party, as admissions by the pleader,[12] where he is a party trial court's attention.[17]

To be so used as evidence by the adverse party, the statement or admission must be contrary to a contention made by the pleader in the case on trial,[18] and the superseded pleading must be introduced in evidence,[19] except where the pleading is superseded or amended after the evidence is closed.[20]

The pleading must be shown originally to have been made as a statement of fact, and connected directly with the party himself, as having been made or authorized and inspired by him.[21] It is not sufficient that the attorney signed and filed the original pleadings,[22] for in many instances the necessity for amendment arises because counsel has failed to apprehend the facts correctly.[23] Such considerations have sometimes led to an assertion of the view that a pleading is not admissible as evidence, even in the same action, where it has been superseded by an amended pleading[24] or has been withdrawn[25] or abandoned,[26] unless the connection of the party therewith is emphasized by some special circumstances,[27] such as the payment of money into court[28] or verification under oath.[29]

As a general rule, however, the courts, while conceding the truth of the considerations on which the foregoing rulings are based, regard them as affecting the weight, rather than the competency, of the statements, and hold that after making all due allowances there may remain a residuum of probative force in statements in abandoned or superseded pleadings, to the benefit of which the opposite party is entitled,[30] in the absence of evidence that the pleading was unauthorized,[31] or an affirmative showing that the party was without knowledge of the real facts when such pleading was prepared.[32] The statement will therefore be received,

Intervener's petition

Where intervener permits plaintiff without objection to introduce in evidence intervener's original petition containing an admission as to a certain issue as to which the petition is amended, the petition is proper for consideration by the jury, whether or not the admission in the petition subsequently amended was the mistake of the pleader.—Gates Co. v. Behrends, 197 N.W. 640, 197 Iowa 499.

Plea of tender

Although in assumpsit a plea of tender or an offer to tender is withdrawn, plaintiff has a right to prove the same as an admission of indebtedness by defendant.—O'Connell v. King, 59 A. 926, 26 R.I. 544.

32. Mo.—Koons v. St. Louis Car Co., 101 S.W. 49, 203 Mo. 227.

Misapprehension or mistake not shown

It is duty of the court in deciding the case to consider any admissions made in the original verified petition, where order granting leave to file amended petition did not show that it was based on an affidavit that ad-

even though the suit has been discontinued,[33] or dismissed,[34] or the judgment therein annulled for want of jurisdiction;[35] but in order to introduce the allegations of a petition, dismissed on the motion of plaintiff, as admissions on the part of defendant, it must be shown that defendant's answer either admitted or failed to deny the averments of the petition.[36]

It is not material that the case is being heard on appeal from a lower court,[37] or whether the superseded pleading was[38] or was not[39] verified, or even that the pleading has been withdrawn absolutely from the files,[40] or has not been filed at all.[41] If, however, it affirmatively appears that the former pleading was filed without authority, it is not admissible.[42]

Where a pleading is not abandoned voluntarily, it has been held that the statements contained therein cannot be used against the pleader as admissions,[43] as in case of a pleading which has been stricken out by the court.[44]

A successful demurrer to a pleading does not preclude the reception in evidence of an admission of fact therein.[45]

Abandonment as to party. An admission against interest by plaintiff in his pleading against two defendants is admissible against him, although the action is abandoned as to one defendant, if it fits into the other defendant's theory of the case.[46]

Entire statement to be considered. Where one party has read in evidence a part of an abandoned pleading of the other party which would be misleading if unexplained, it is proper to permit the latter party to introduce the whole of the pleading in evidence.[47]

Independent relevancy. Abandoned or superseded pleadings may be independently relevant, if they are inconsistent with the subsequent pleadings,[48] and where they possess the characteristic of independent relevancy they may be received to prove some independent fact connected with the case,[49] to show that the pleader made a different claim or defense at another time,[50] to raise unfavorable inferences as to good faith in a belated claim or defense,[51] to show a waiver of defense,[52] or to im-missions therein were made under a misapprehension or by a mistake.—People ex rel. Nelson v. Central Mfg. Dist. Bank, 28 N.E.2d 154, 306 Ill. App. 15.

Bill of interpleader dismissed
Where defendant sought by a sworn bill of interpleader to have action dismissed, and bill of interpleader was dismissed on some technical ground on motion by plaintiff, material allegations of such bill were admissible in evidence in first action against defendant.—Ward v. peach the pleader as a witness,[53] or they may be admissible on the pleader's behalf to rebut discrediting testimony.[54] Under some statutes, abandoned or superseded pleadings cannot be used as evidence in the case in which they are filed.[55]

§ 305. Unnecessary Pleadings

Allegations in unnecessary pleadings cannot be regarded as judicial admissions by the pleader.

Allegations in unnecessary pleadings cannot be regarded as judicial admissions by which the pleader is concluded.[56]

§ 306. Amendments Proposed but Disallowed

Admissions in disallowed proposed amendments have been held admissible.

It has been held that admissions, beneficial to plaintiff, and material to his case, contained in a proffered amendment to defendant's answer, were admissible as evidence in behalf of plaintiff, although the proffered amendment was disallowed and the petition waived discovery.[57]

§ 307. Stipulations and Agreements as to Facts

A stipulation or agreed statement of facts is admissible against the party as a judicial admission, if it is relevant to the issue on which it is offered. If it is not limited to the pending trial it is admissible on a subsequent trial of the cause, and may be admitted in another action.

An agreed statement of facts[58] or other stipulations by counsel,[59] as to matters of fact within the scope of their professional functions,[60] binds the party as a judicial admission,[61] although it was made before issue joined;[62] and such an admission is competent evidence against the party,[63] provided, of course, it is relevant to the issue on which it is offered.[64]

Where these agreements are made to avoid continuances[65] to expedite the trial of a cause,[66] or for some other specific purpose, and are by their terms limited to a particular occasion or temporary object,[67] they possess no force beyond the occasion

Stipulation as to interstate commerce
In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 51–59, to recover damages for personal injuries received while working on an engine, a stipulation by defendant's counsel that defendant was engaged in interstate commerce is not an admission that the engine was being used in interstate commerce at the time of the injury.—Day v. or after the purpose has been accomplished.[68] If, however, the admissions are on their face unqualified, no limitation to the pending trial is implied, but if by their terms they are not limited, and are unqualified admissions of facts, the limitation is not implied,[69] and they are receivable as judicial admissions, in any subsequent trial of the cause between the parties,[70] in the absence of fraud or mistake in making the agreement.[71]

An unqualified statement or stipulation connected with the party as having been made or authorized by him is admissible against him in another action,[72] even though the admission may have been withdrawn.[73] Abandoning the stipulation by consent connotes a mutual waiver of any probative effect.[74] So also, where the agreed facts are as to present status and the conditions are subject to change, the stipulation is not admissible after a change has actually occurred.[75] An agreed statement of facts made for the purposes of one action cannot be received in another action between different parties merely because the latter action relates to the same subject matter;[76] and a stipulation between plaintiff and one of several defendants is not binding on defendant who did not sign it, and who makes timely objection to its introduction in evidence.[77]

a. Affidavits
b. Depositions

a. Affidavits

A judicial admission in an affidavit used in the case is admissible against the party making or adopting the affidavit, and it may also be admitted in another action to which he is a party.

A judicial admission contained in an affidavit used in the case is, when relevant, competent evidence,[78] even though it was not made, but merely adopted, by the party against whom it is used,[79] and it may be competent evidence for the adverse party

79. U.S.—Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. v. Brewer, C.C.A.Ala., 92 F. 2d 804.
22 C.J. p 341 note 20.

Affidavits of other persons, which adverse claimants of land presented to show adverse possession entitling claimants to patents from state under statute, are admissible against claimants and their privies as constituting by adoption claimants' own statements of nature and course of

on the trial of another issue from that on which it was offered.[80] A judicial admission by affidavit is admissible although the affiant has testified to the same effect,[81] although the affiant is dead,[82] although the affidavit was irregularly taken,[83] although the authority of the officer before whom the affidavit was sworn to is not proved,[84] or although it was sworn to on information and belief.[85] An affidavit made in a state court may be used as an admission in the cause after its removal to a federal court;[86] and, while an affidavit made in one case cannot have a conclusive effect in another case, it is nevertheless admissible,[87] even on behalf of a party who was not a party to the action in which it was made or originally used.[88] The affidavit must of course be formally offered in evidence in order to render it available.[89]

An ex parte affidavit is not admissible as an admission against interest of a third person who derives his rights through affiant;[90] and such an affidavit of one defendant is not admissible against his codefendant where the latter has had no opportunity to file cross interrogatories.[91] An affidavit by a third person on an application for a new trial for newly discovered evidence cannot be held a judicial admission of absence of merit in an appeal from the judgment rendered on the first trial.[92] So also a failure to make a motion to vacate an order of arrest issued on ex parte affidavits cannot be regarded as an admission of the truth of the averments of the affidavits.[93]

b. Depositions

Statements made in a deposition, relevant to the issues, may be admitted against the deponent as admissions against interest in the same or another action to which he is a party, even though he is present in court and able to testify, or has testified.

Statements made by a party in his deposition in the cause containing relevant judicial admissions are competent against him,[94] even though they are not based on his personal knowledge.[95] A deposition taken in one action may also be received as an admission against interest in another action,[96] in which the deponent is properly joined as a party,[97] even though he was not a party to the action in which the deposition was taken,[98] regardless of whether or not it was used in the action in which it was taken,[99] and whether it was made by the party himself or by an authorized agent.[1]

A deposition is competent although it was made in a personal capacity and is offered against the party in a representative capacity;[2] although it was taken in perpetuam[3] or de bene esse;[4] although it was taken on insufficient notice,[5] or without the statutory formalities;[6] although it was not filed as required by statute;[7] although the cause for taking it no longer exists;[8] although the deponent is dead;[9] or even though the deposition itself has been suppressed.[10] A statute making a deposition generally inadmissible unless the witness is dead, absent, or incapacitated does not affect the admissibility of the deposition of a party as an admission against interest.[11]

The fact that deponent is present and able to testify, or has testified does not preclude the introduction of his deposition as an admission.[12]

§ 309. Interrogatories and Answers Thereto

Interrogatories and answers thereto may be competent as judicial admissions either in the same or another action.

Where interrogatories are filed for the purpose of obtaining discovery, the party's answers have the force of judicial admissions in the suit in which they are made,[15] although the answers were not made with the formality required by statute.[16] Such statements may also be received as admissions in

Answers in deposition
Where the declarations made by a deponent, who is a party to the suit and is examined by the opposite party, are proved by the testimony of the stenographer who took the deposition, which is not introduced in evidence, the statements of deponent have the effect merely of declarations against interest.—In re Arnold, 82 P. 252, 147 Cal. 583.

an action other than that in which they were made,[17] although the issues in the two cases are different.[18]

Interrogatories prepared but abandoned are not admissible as admissions of the attorney who prepared them or as depositions taken by consent,[19] and unanswered interrogatories are not admissible, as being confessed, where it is shown that there was no refusal to answer them.[20]

§ 310. Claim Statements

Competent admissions may be contained in statements of claims.

Competent admissions may be contained in a statement of claim against a decedent's estate[21] or a mechanic's lien claim.[22]

§ 311. Testimony

The testimony given by or for a party at the trial of a case may be used against him as an admission in the same, or on a subsequent, trial, or even in another action, provided such testimony is material and relevant.

The testimony of a party at the trial of a case may amount to a judicial admission, and may be admitted and used against him as such at the same trial,[23] or as primary evidence on a subsequent trial.[24] So also, except where there are statutory provisions to the contrary with respect to evidence

Interrogatories and answers of an officer of a corporation in one case are not admissible in another case as admissions of the corporation, unless the officer had authority to make admissions for the corporation, or unless the corporation dealt with them as admissions.—Sizer v. Melton, 58 S.E. 1055, 129 Ga. 143.

In federal court

Defendant's answers to interrogatories in previous action, as required by state law, may properly be admitted in a subsequent action in federal court.—Federal Surety Co. v. City of Staunton, Ill., for Use of McWane Cast Iron Pipe Co., C.C.A.Ala., 29 F.2d 9, certiorari denied 49 S.Ct. 253, 279 U.S. 840, 73 L.Ed. 986.

Inadmissibility

In action for injuries sustained in automobile accident, exclusion of interrogatory as to whether defendant had been convicted for drunken driving on night of accident and defendant's affirmative answer, unaccompanied by any evidence of sentence, was not error, since the fact elicited did not constitute an admission or confession of defendant that defendant was drunk at the time of the accident.—Blackman v. Admissible as primary evidence

The testimony of a party to an action or suit, given on a former trial thereof, and tending to show an admission by the party against interest, is admissible as "primary evidence," when offered by the party seeking the benefit of such supposed admission.—Morrison v. Judy, W.Va., 13 S.E.2d 751.

A properly authenticated transcript of the evidence of a former trial of the same case between the same parties is admissible in evidence on another trial, to prove admissions made by a party who is a witness.—Empire Cotton Oil Co. v. Penny, 102 S.E. 556, 25 Ga.App. 104.

Coroner's inquest

(1) Admissions in defendant's testimony at a coroner's inquest, as to his actions at the time of the accident, are admissible in a subsequent trial of an action for injuries or death, caused by the accident.

Mo.—Hudlow v. Langerhans, 91 S.W. 2d 629, 230 Mo.App. 1160.

(2) However, in an action on a fraternal benefit certificate void if death should occur as a consequence of a violation of law by the member, a transcript of evidence at the inquest showing that deceased was accidentally shot while engaged in making an unlawful assault is inadmissible as an admission, notwithstanding the proofs of death prescribed by the by-laws required a duly authenticated transcript of the proceedings at the inquest, since the furnishing of such transcript was essentially involuntary.—Allen v. Knights and Ladies of Security, 195 P. 616, 108 Kan. 419.

Evidence taken before a special master and filed before the party in certain specified proceedings,[25] testimony given by a party on a trial of one case is competent against him as an admission on the subsequent trial of another action,[26] whether he was a party to such former action[27] or merely a witness therein,[28] and even though the testimony was given under compulsory process,[29] or in another state.[30] The former statement must, of course, be relevant in the action in which it is offered.[31] A party is entitled to show that his opponent is concealing a fact to which he has previously testified,[32] or has given testimony on another occasion inconsistent with his present evidence,[33] or the statement may be admissible because it shows knowledge.[34]

It is not necessary that the answers should have been responsive to the questions;[35] that the testimony claimed to be an admission should have been all of the party's testimony on that particular matter;[36] that a similar admission should have been contained in the party's pleading;[37] that the attention of the witness should be first called to his former statement;[38] that the former statement should be contradictory of any statement made by the party at the trial in which it is offered;[39] or even that the former testimony should have been given in court.[40] It has been held not sufficient to exclude the statement that the testimony was illegally taken,[41] although this has been denied.[42] The former testimony is not inadmissible because it was merely an expression of opinion without a statement of the facts on which such opinion was based.[43]

As the admission is primary evidence, it is immaterial that the party who made it is present in court and can be called as a witness;[44] but this rule has been held not to apply to the prior admissions of a witness, not a party, where the witness himself may be produced and examined.[45]

Testimony of third persons as witnesses in another case are admissible against a party if the latter is bound thereby because of agency,[46] joint or common interest,[47] or his having vouched for their credibility and impliedly asserted the fact by calling them as witnesses;[48] but not otherwise.[49] It has been held that where a party sues in a representative capacity an admission by him while testifying in an individual capacity in a former trial is inadmissible.[50]

In action for alleged fraudulent breach of life policy, testimony of defendant's agent who testified on former trial is admissible on subsequent trial where same issue was involved as against contention that at time of trial of first suit he was no longer in employ of defendant, since under such circumstances alleged agent would constitute a "third person," whose testimony would be admissible on subsequent trial.—Dyson v. the issue involved.[53] This rule is especially applicable where the judgment was rendered by default[54] or taken by confession.[55] A judgment in a prior action, however, which is not conclusive because of lack of identity of parties, although rendered with the consent of the party against whom it is offered in a subsequent suit, is not admissible as an admission by such party of the verity of the facts therein recited.[56] A judgment entered on a motion, allowing certain items, is not an admission of the justice of any item allowed by the court on a different theory.[57] Under the express provisions of some statutes, an offer before trial to confess judgment for a part of the cause of action or amount claimed, is not admissible as an admission of the cause of action or of the amount to which plaintiff is entitled.[58] The taking of a judgment by a creditor against a partnership in which one member is bankrupt is not an admission of anything affecting the constituent members of the partnership.[59]

The entry of a compulsory nonsuit, on which a motion for its removal is withdrawn by leave of court, is not admissible as an admission.[60]

§ 313. Applications for Continuances

An application for a continuance, containing admissions, is competent evidence.

D. BY WHOM MADE

1. In General

§ 314. General Statement

An admission may be made either by a party himself or by a person for whose statements he is legally responsible.

An admission may be made either by a party himself or by a person for whose statements he is legally responsible.[62]

Condition of declarant. An admission made by one who was at the time suffering great pain as a result of a fatal injury, and who was also in a stupified or only partially conscious condition, has been rejected.[63]

§ 315. Persons Not Sui Juris

Admissions of infants and other declarants who are not sui juris may be shown for what they are worth.

In order that admissions may be received in evidence, it is not necessary that declarant should be sui juris.[64] Admissions of infants,[65] insane persons,[66] married women,[67] or spendthrifts under guardianship,[68] may be shown for what they are worth, although they are not binding on declarant.[69]

Admissions of one who has been declared an habitual drunkard have been held not to be competent against his committee.[70]

§ 316. Interest at Time of Statement

It is essential to the reception of admissions in evidence that declarant shall have had some interest in the matter at the time of making the statement.

It is a requisite of admissibility of admissions that declarant should have had, at the time of making the statement, some interest in the matter.[71] Accordingly, a statement in disparagement of title is admissible if made while declarant was seized of the particular interest to which the statement relates,[72] but not if made before he was possessed of,[73] or after he had parted with,[74] such interest.

It is not essential, however, that an admission by a party, as distinguished from a statement against interest made by a person who is not a party, be contrary to the interest of the party at the time it is made; it is enough if it be inconsistent with the position which the party takes either in pleadings or at the trial.[75]

§ 317. Parties to the Record

An admission of a party to the record against his interest of a material fact relevant to an issue in the case is competent against him as substantive evidence of the fact admitted.

An admission of a party to the record is competent against him,[76] although he is prosecuting or de-

Construction and application of statutes

(1) A statute providing that a statement secured from an injured person within a specified number of days after injuries is presumably fraudulent for use in action for damages for the injuries merely creates an initial presumption of fraud and does not render the statement inadmissible as evidence.—Lestico v. Kuehner, 283 N.W. 122, 204 Minn. 125.

(2) A statute providing that no statement made by injured person within a certain number of hours after injury happened shall be received in evidence in action for resulting damages, unless admissible as part of res gestæ, is inapplicable to statements voluntarily and intelligently made by an injured person to a person who is entirely disinterested and is not engaged in procuring statements from injured persons for the purpose of their being used as evidence against the persons making them.—Kirsch v. Pomisal, 294 N.W. 865, 236 Wis. 264.

on a prior showing by the opposite party of the time and place when it was made,[89] or conditioned on his ability to fix such time and place;[90] and it is not necessary to the competency of the admission of a party that it shall have been made as a part of the res gestæ,[91] although in a particular case the declaration of a party against interest may have been made at such time and under such circumstances as to be part of the res gestæ and therefore admissible both as a res gestæ statement and as an admission or declaration against interest.[92]

Further, admissibility of a party's admission is not conditioned on showing that the conduct of the party offering the statement was affected by it.[93] The admission of a party is competent against him regardless of whether he is[94] or is not[95] present at the trial.

To be receivable as an admission against interest, a statement of a party to a suit must be against his interest,[96] and must concern a material fact.[97] On the other hand, the admissions of a party against his interest are admissible against him where they are admissions of material matters[98] and bear on, or are pertinent or relevant to, an issue in the case.[99]

Where admissions are offered as those of a party, declarant must be a party to the record at the time of the offer[1] and the declaration must be traced to the party in question by some evidence of the identity of declarant with such party.[2]

Nature and use of admission of party. An admission of a party to the record is original, primary, independent, and substantive evidence[3] of the fact or facts covered thereby[4] and it may be used to make

(3) A statute requiring a motorist involved in an accident to give his name, address, and other information and to render assistance and providing that the rendering of assistance or other compliance with the statute shall not be evidence of liability merely provides, in effect, that the performance of the required acts shall not be considered an admission of liability and does not preclude the giving of evidence of acts or statements from which liability on the part of the motorist may logically be inferred.—Rieger v. out the opponent's case[5] by proving or disproving a fact in issue;[6] it is admitted not merely for the purpose of impeachment,[7] although it may be used for this purpose, as well as for the purpose of furnishing substantive evidence, where the party who made it takes the witness stand and gives testimony contrary to, or inconsistent with, his prior extrajudicial statement.[8]

While an admission of one party may be used to confirm or corroborate other evidence introduced by the adverse party,[9] it is not necessary that the admission should be entirely consistent with the other evidence introduced by the adverse party,[10] it being permissible for one party to take advantage of the admissions of the other party as long as no repudiation of the former's pleading and general trial theory results.[11]

Statements constituting admission of party. If a statement offered as an admission of a party against interest is deemed not to be such, or not to be within the rule making it admissible, it should not be received in evidence or, if received, considered and given weight, as an admission.[12]

According to some authorities a statement of defendant that good care will be given plaintiff in a personal injury case or that his hospital expenses will be paid is not an admission of negligence or liability.[13] Other authorities have reached the opposite conclusion as to such statements and other general statements, such as that the matter will be fixed up or made right,[14] notwithstanding the statement

Lack of dependence

(1) The admissibility of admissions of a party is not dependent on any tendency to discredit party's testimony.—Malia for Use and Benefit of Creditors of North Sanpete Bank v. Seeley, 57 P.2d 357, 89 Utah 262.

(2) A statement of defendant may be competent as admission against interest, although inadmissible for impeachment purposes.—Zylstra v. Graham, 221 N.W. 318, 244 Mich. 319, affirmed 224 N.W. 343, 246 Mich. 91.

also discloses that defendant has insurance,[15] although, standing alone, defendant's statement that he has insurance is not an admission of liability[16] and a mere statement that an insurance company will repair a truck damaged in a collision with a passenger automobile is not an admission of ownership of the car.[17]

§ 318. Coparties

a. In general
b. Admissibility against coparty

a. In General

Admissions of one of two or more coparties are competent against the declarant, except where they relate to a fact on which the interests of all of the coparties depend and where, consequently, they cannot be received in evidence against the declarant without affecting the other coparties injuriously.

As a general rule admissions of one of two or more coparties are competent against declarant,[18] although he may have been defaulted;[19] and they are not to be excluded merely because in terms they also affect a coparty,[20] or because they may have an ulterior or collateral effect detrimental to a coparty.[21]

Where, however, the interests of coparties are all dependent on the existence of a particular fact, the admission of one of them regarding such fact cannot be received,[22] because it could have no effect as to himself without affecting the others.[23] Thus in proceedings to contest a will where there are several legatees, devisees, or beneficiaries having similar, but separate and distinct, interests and the issue involves the validity of the whole will, rather than the validity of any particular devise or bequest, in the absence of proof of conspiracy, the admissions of a devisee, legatee, or beneficiary as to the mental capacity of the testator or as to undue influence are inadmissible.[24] However, an insistence that the admission of a legatee against his interest is not admissible because it might be injuridered at defendant's request, that he would pay hospital bill, are competent as admissions.—Valentine v. Morgan, 222 N.W. 412, 207 Iowa 232.

Entry of discontinuance. The entry of a discontinuance as to a particular party renders his admissions incompetent.[26]

Admissibility in favor of coparty. The admission of a defendant against his own interest and in favor of a codefendant is competent for the codefendant.[27] However, a defendant who is shown by plaintiff's evidence to have employed plaintiff cannot escape liability on the theory that another defendant has admitted that he also employed plaintiff;[28] and where separate actions, based on independent grounds, are brought by the same plaintiff against different defendants, the admissions of defendant in one case are not a defense to defendant in another case.[29]

b. Admissibility against Coparty

An admission of one party may not be received in evidence against a coparty, unless it is chargeable to, and binding on, the coparty because of authorization, adoption, acquiescence, privity, joint interest or liability, or other good reason.

An admission of one party is not binding on, or evidence against, a coparty[30] where it was not made in the presence of the coparty,[31] or with his knowledge,[32] consent,[33] or authority,[34] where the coparty has not adopted the statement as his own,[35] where the interest or liability of the coparties is several,[36] and there is no agency,[37] partnership,[38] conspiracy,[39] or privity[40] between the parties, or joint purpose on their part.[41] The rule in this respect is the same in equity and at law;[42] it applies to judicial,[43] as well as to extrajudicial, admissions; and it is particularly applicable where the intent of the party making the admission is merely nominal[44] or there is no evidence that he has any interest in the subject matter of the admission.[45]

On the other hand, the admission of one party may be competent against a coparty in some situations,[46] as where, on grounds of privity or agency, the admission would be competent against the coparty although declarant had not been made a party,[47] or where the admission is fairly chargeable to the coparty of declarant by reason of acquiescence,[48] or where, in situations discussed infra this subdivision, the admission is rendered competent by the joint ownership or interest, or joint liability of the parties.

Community of interest. A mere community of interest between coparties will not make the admissions of one competent against the others,[49] even where, as in an action for a joint tort,[50] or for divorce on the ground of adultery,[51] the act charged, if committed at all, must have been committed by both parties, or where a common interest exists in a given property[52] or claim[53] under a legal or equitable[54] title. The same is true as to admissions of one of several persons claiming as devisees or legatees under a will,[55] or as heirs or distributees under the statute of descent.[56]

Further, there is no such joint interest as will make the admissions of one competent against the others between tenants in common,[57] tenants by the entirety,[58] a tenant for life and the remainderman,[59] executors and administrators,[60] trustees,[61] or stockholders in a corporation.[62]

Joint ownership or interest. Where several coparties to the record are the joint owners of real or personal property,[63] or are jointly interested in the subject matter of the controversy,[64] the admissions of one are competent against all, where no fraud or collusion appears,[65] except for the purpose of proving the joint interest.[66]

Joint liability. Where two or more codefendants, if liable at all, are liable jointly, an admission of one is competent against the other,[67] provided it was made within the scope of the common purpose and relates to the joint interest in the matter out of which the liability is claimed to arise.[68]

Joint pleading. Where all the coparties unite in a pleading, admissions contained therein are competent against all and not merely against the one by whom the pleading was verified.[69]

Common purpose. Where a number of persons, owning lands of like quality in severalty, unite as plaintiffs for a purpose common to all the properties, the admissions against interest of some of the parties as to their tracts may be applied to all.[70]

Coparty in former suit. Where the answer of the husband in a former suit against husband and wife is receivable as an admission against interest in a subsequent suit against him alone, there is no error in admitting the answer of the wife which is practically identical with that of the husband.[71]

§ 319. Nominal Parties

Admissions of a nominal party are not competent to affect the real party in interest.

Where an action is prosecuted or defended in the name of a person other than the real party in interest, admissions of the nominal party are not competent to affect the real party,[72] unless the admission was made while the nominal party possessed a beneficial interest in the subject matter.[73] Nevertheless admissions of a sole plaintiff on the record that he has no interest are provable to defeat the action, where there is no proof that any one else has an interest.[74]

Guardian ad litem or next friend. Admissions of a guardian ad litem or next friend are not competent to affect the interest of the person whom declarant represents in the action.[75]

§ 320. Real Parties in Interest

Admissions or declarations against interest made by a person who is not a party to the record, but who is a real party in interest, are competent against a nominal party representing declarant's interest in the action.

Declarations of a person beneficially interested in the result of litigation are admissible against the nominal party representing his interest,[76] unless it

Family expenses
In an action against husband and wife to recover for coal as family expenses, evidence of an admission of the husband that the account is due should have been admitted, as it would have tended to fix the liability of the husband, and the nature of the merchandise sold, if for family use, would have made a statute apply so as to charge a like liability against the wife.—Richardson v. is impossible to admit them without prejudicing the interests of nondeclarants.[77] Where a trustee has a purely nominal position in relation to the action,[78] and where an executor or administrator is a formal party,[79] statements of the person beneficially interested are admissible; but where an executor or administrator is actually representing the interests of the estate, declarations of an heir at law, next of kin, legatee, or devisee are inadmissible,[80] and under similar circumstances the admission of a cestui que trust may be incompetent.[81]

Nature of interest. In order to render a person's admissions competent his interest must be real and financial;[82] it is not sufficient that he has a sentimental interest due to relationship,[83] is under a moral obligation to indemnify a party,[84] or has an interest similar to the one involved in the action.[85] A person who will be called on to pay the judgment in case of an adverse result,[86] or who will receive the whole or a portion of the proceeds in the case of a successful one,[87] is a real party in interest within the rule stated.

Showing interest. The fact of interest in a third person should be established prima facie by evidence exclusive of his own declarations.[88]

§ 321. Strangers

A party to an action is not bound by an admission, to which he has not assented, of a person who does not occupy toward him any relation of privity, agency, or joint interest.

Unless he assents thereto,[89] a party to an action cannot be affected by the admission of a person who does not occupy toward him any relation of privity, agency, or joint interest.[90]

Recovery as community property

In motorist's action for injuries sustained in grade crossing collision, evidence of statements made by motorist's wife to claim agent concerning the collision was admissible where it tended to contradict wife's testimony, notwithstanding wife was not named a party plaintiff, since recovery would have been community property, and wife had as much interest in the outcome as did husband, and her interest would not have been increased by including her name as party plaintiff.—Hinrichs v. 2. PRIVIES AND FORMER OWNERS GENERALLY

§ 322. In General

As against a party to the record an admission of a privy, such as a former owner of property under or through whom he claims, is competent.

Privity between declarant and a party to the record may render an admission competent,[91] and hence where an owner of property makes admissions in disparagement of his title these may be shown against persons claiming under or through him.[92] Such an admission, being primary evidence, is competent, although, it has been held, declarant is available as a witness;[93] but it is necessary, as a preliminary to the admission of the statement, that the existence of privity should be shown;[94] and to be admissible against successors in title and interest, it is necessary that the statement in question be against the interest of declarant.[95]

The statements of a person as to his precise intention in putting a chattel in its place on realty, made after the controversy had arisen, are not to be accepted except as against himself.[96]

Person having paramount title. As against one having a paramount or superior title, the admissions of one in possession have been held not to be competent.[97]

Adverse claimant. As against one claiming adversely to declarant, an admission cannot be shown, there being no privity.[98]

§ 323. Necessity for Title in Declarant

To be competent against a successor in title, an admission of a former owner of property must have been made when title was in declarant.

In order to render an admission of a former owner of property competent against his successor in title, it must have been made at a time when the title was in declarant.[99] An admission of a former owner may not be received against his successor in title if it was made either before declarant acquired title[1] or after it had passed from him,[2] unless the successor has concurred or acquiesced therein.[3]

§ 324. Real Estate

An admission against interest made by a former owner of real property while he was owner is competent against one claiming under him an interest acquired after the making of the declaration, unless the successor in interest is protected against the subject matter of the admission by reason of being a purchaser for value without notice.

A statement, declaration, or admission against interest, made by a former owner of real estate on his own knowledge,[4] and during his ownership[5] or possession,[6] or while in both ownership and possession,[7] is competent against one who claims under him an interest acquired since the declaration was made,[8] unless the successor in interest is so situated that the fact stated, if true, cannot affect him, as in the case of a purchaser for value without notice.[9] The rule is the same whether the admission is judicial[10] or extrajudicial;[11] and a competent admission may be by silence or acquiescence,[12] or in a written instrument which is not effective for the purpose for which it is designed.[13]

There are situations in which the rule is not applicable and the declaration or admission of a former owner of real estate should be rejected,[14] as where the admission or declaration is immaterial,[15] it was not against the interest of declarant at the time it was made,[16] declarant never, at any time, had title to the real property in question,[17] or, at the time of the making of the declaration, he had parted with title[18] or was not in possession.[19] An admission by a person under whom only one of several parties claim affects such party only.[20] There is some authority that the declaration of a former owner of real estate is admissible only with reference to his possession, and, as against his successor, is inadmissible to deny, attack, or destroy a record

§ 325. Grantors

Admissions of a grantor against his interest, made while he held title, are competent against persons claiming under him; but admissions made by the grantor after he has parted with title are not admissible against his grantee or other persons claiming under his grant.

Admissions, declarations, or statements of a grantor in derogation of his title and against his interest, made while he held title or was in possession, are admissible against his successors in interest and all persons claiming under him.[22] On the other hand, it has been asserted generally that declarations of a grantor, not made in the presence of the grantee and not sanctioned, or acquiesced in, by the grantee with full knowledge thereof, are not admissible to defeat the deed or impeach the title of the grantee,[23] regardless of whether they were made before or after the execution of the deed.[24]

Statements after alienation. Declarations of a grantor, made after he has parted with his title, are not admissible against his grantee or other persons claiming under his grant,[25] especially where they were made in the absence of the grantee.[26] The rule applies although the grantor has reserved an equitable interest in the land conveyed.[27] Abandonment[28] or dedication[29] is regarded as equivalent to a conveyance for the purpose of making the rule applicable; and the rule is the same where the property has been removed from the possession of declarant by operation of law.[30]

In some situations, however, the rule is considered inapplicable and subsequent declarations of a grantor are held admissible,[31] as where the declarations do not affect[32] or impeach[33] the title or interest of the grantee, but, instead, tend to sustain the deed,[34] or where the declarations were made in the presence of the grantee and were acquiesced in or adopted by him.[35]

Persons claiming under deeds of common grantor. Where persons claim under successive deeds of a common grantor, his relevant declarations affect grantees taking under conveyances subsequent thereto, but are inadmissible against those who acquired interests prior to that time.[36]

§ 326. Mortgagors, Donors, and the Like

The admissions of a mortgagor, donor, or lienholder of real property, made while declarant held title to, or an interest in, the property, are admissible against their privies; and while the admissions of a landlord may be competent against the tenant, the tenant's admissions are inadmissible as against the landlord.

Declarations of a mortgagor of real property are competent as against the mortgagee, so far as they affect the estate conveyed,[37] unless they were made after the execution of the mortgage.[38] The same principle applies in the case of other liens on real property.[39]

Donors. Admissions of a donor of real property are competent to affect the title or interest of the donee,[40] unless they were made subsequent to the consummation of the gift.[41]

Lienholders. Admissions made by one holding a lien on real property are competent against others whose title is derived through such lien,[42] unless made after declarant's interest in the property had terminated.[43]

Landlord and tenant. Declarations of a landlord in relation to the estate leased are usually competent against his tenant,[44] but declarations of a tenant cannot be received as admissions as against the landlord.[45]

§ 327. Deceased Owners

Under some circumstances the admissions of a deceased owner of real property are admissible against his successors in interest or persons claiming under him or relying on his title.

30. Mo.—Benshaw v. The Pawnee, 19 Mo. 532.

31. Summary of situations
Declarations admissible as part of the res gestæ as exceptions to the general rule that declarations by grantor subsequent to conveyance disparaging grantee's title are inadmissible are: First, where evidence first establishes a continuing conspiracy to defraud between grantor and grantee; second, where the declarations are made in grantee's presence and are not dissented from by him; and, third, where grantor remains in possession after the transfer.—Ollason v. Glasscock, 224 P. 284, 26 Ariz. 193.

Transfer of title in issue
When a grantor has parted with title to property, his acts and declarations in disparagement thereof, made in the absence of the grantee, are inadmissible, but whenever in a particular action the issue itself is whether grantor has parted with title, his subsequent acts and declarations are admissible as bearing on the question of delivery.—Barcroft v. Livacich, 96 P.2d 951, 35 Cal.App.2d 710.

Admissibility for other purpose
Admission is not binding on mortgagee, but nevertheless, may be admissible in evidence to prove a certain fact in issue.—Susquehanna Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. United Telephone & Telegraph Co., C.C.A.Pa., 6 F.2d 179.

Admissions of part of owners
In an action for possession of land, which was leased to plaintiffs after defendants' failure to drill certain oil wells as prescribed in the lease to them, admissions made by some of the owners were inadmissible, where the suit was brought to recover the entire tract, the defense was predicated on the right to retain the entire tract, and the case was tried on the theory of entire claims to all interests in the lands.—Wally v. Jones, 119 A. 75, 275 Pa. 250.

45. Tex.—Carter v. Townsend, Civ. App., 139 S.W.2d 641, error dismissed, judgment correct.

Relevant[46] admissions as to matters of fact,[47] in disparagement of his title or against his interest,[48] made by a deceased owner of real estate while he was actually in possession and claiming ownership,[49] or after the execution of a deed, but in the presence of the grantee,[50] are competent against his successors in interest and all persons claiming under him or relying on his title,[51] such as his grantees,[52] devisees,[53] heirs at law,[54] or his executors or administrators in any proceedings in which they rely on his title.[55] Declarations of a deceased grantor made after the execution of the deed are admissible on the question of delivery, where delivery is a controverted matter and the other evidence bearing thereon is inconclusive or gives rise to conflicting inferences.[56]

Sometimes, however, the declarations of a deceased owner or alleged owner of real property are held inadmissible,[57] as where they are not of such nature as to constitute admissions against interest,[58] or are too general and indefinite,[59] or where they were made after a conveyance of the land in question by decedent[60] and not in the presence of the grantee,[61] or when declarant did not have either possession or legal title.[62] According to some authorities, the declarations of a deceased former owner, while admissible to show the character of his possession,[63] are not competent on the question of title.[64]

§ 328. Husband and Wife; Dower Interest

The declarations of a deceased husband ordinarily are not competent against a tenant in dower.

It has been considered by several courts that a tenant in dower does not claim under her husband in such a sense that his declarations are competent against her by reason of privity,[65] although the contrary view has also been asserted.[66]

§ 329. Personal Property

Statements of a former owner of personal property relative to his title have been held admissible against persons claiming under him, unless they were made after he had parted with title.

It is generally held that a relevant[67] statement by the owner of chattels, regarding or affecting his title, is admissible against parties claiming under him,[68] although there is authority for the contrary view.[69] Such declarations cannot affect one who claims under a title adverse or paramount to that of declarant.[70]

Statements after transfer. Statements of a former owner of personal property, made after he has parted with his title, are not admissible in evidence either against the immediate transferee of declarant[71] or against a subsequent owner,[72] unless the person against whom the statement is sought to be used has acquiesced therein.[73]

§ 330. Sellers

The admissions of a seller of personal property are admissible against the buyer where they were made before the sale, but ordinarily are not admissible where they were made after the sale.

The admissions of a seller of personal property in derogation of his title are admissible against the buyer where they were made before the sale;[74] but where they were made after the sale, they are not available against successors in title or to defeat the title of the buyer,[75] unless the buyer acquiesced therein,[76] or unless, as is considered infra § 341, there is an issue as to the fraudulent character of the sale in respect of creditors and the circumstances are such as to bring the case within an exception to the general rule.

§ 331. Mortgagors and Pledgors

Declarations of a mortgagor of chattels, made before the execution of the mortgage, may be admissible against the mortgagee or a purchaser at a foreclosure sale, but declarations of a mortgagor or pledgor made after the execution of the mortgage or pledge are not admissible against the mortgagee or pledgee.

Declarations of a mortgagor of chattels against his title, made before execution of the mortgage, are usually held admissible against the mortgagee,[77] or one who purchased at a foreclosure sale under the mortgage,[78] although the contrary view has some support.[79]

On the other hand, it is generally held that declarations of a mortgagor of personalty made after the execution of the mortgage cannot affect the mortgagee,[80] or one who claims through the mortgage under foreclosure;[81] but it has been held that declarations made by the mortgagor after the execution of the mortgage and while he was in possession of the property are admissible against a commission agent who, although not a purchaser and, strictly speaking, not a privy, bases his right to dispose of the property on the title of the mortgagor and who bears a relation to the mortgagor as close as that of a successor in title.[82]

quently to the execution of the pledge are not admissible against the pledgee.[83]

§ 332. Mortgagees

The declarations of a mortgagee of personalty have been considered to be competent against persons subsequently claiming under him.

Declarations of a mortgagee of personalty, made while holding his securities have been considered to be competent against those subsequently claiming under him,[84] although the contrary view has been asserted.[85]

§ 333. Assignors

a. In general
b. Assignors of negotiable instruments

a. In General

While there is some contrary authority, generally admissions of an assignor, including an assignor for the benefit of creditors, are competent against the assignee and persons claiming under him where they were made before, but not where they were made after, the assignment.

While there is authority for rejecting such statements although they were made before declarant parted with his title,[86] the generally accepted view is that declarations of the assignor of a chose in action, which amount to admissions so far as he is concerned, are competent against the assignee and persons claiming under him.[87] This is true regardless of the nature of the claim or instrument assigned,[88] unless, as shown in subdivision b of this section, it is a negotiable instrument transferred before maturity, for value, to a person without notice of the subject matter of the admission. However, to be admissible against the assignee, such admissions or declarations must have been made at a time when declarant had or owned an interest in the claim or property,[89] and this ordinarily means that they must have been made before the assignment.[90]

Declarations after transfer. Declarations of an assignor made after the assignment and notice thereof to the debtor are not admissible against the assignee or those claiming under him,[91] provided the assignment was made in good faith.[92] The application of the rule is not affected by the fact that the action is brought by the assignee in the name of the assignor.[93]

Insolvency or bankruptcy. Although a contrary view has been asserted,[94] admissions of an assignor for the benefit of creditors or of one who takes advantage of a state or national law for the relief of insolvent debtors are, when made before, or in, the assignment, usually held competent evidence against the assignee or trustee.[95] The rule does not apply to statements of a bankrupt which are self-serving and not admissions against interest.[96]

Declarations made subsequent to the assignment are usually held not competent to affect the rights

Admissions in schedules

(1) It has been held that bankrupt's admissions in schedules may be used against trustee, to prove falsity of statement made before bankruptcy, on faith of which goods were sold bankrupt.—In re Weissman, C.C.A.Conn., 19 F.2d 769, 53 A. L.R. 644.

(2) However, it has also been held that ex parte statement in schedules, without right of cross-examination, that bankrupts assumed note, is not binding on trustee or other creditors. —In re Haynsworth, D.C.S.C, 34 F. 2d 334, affirmed in part and reversed in part on other grounds, C.C.A., Jones v. Kendall, 34 F.2d 344.

of those claiming under it,[97] although exceptions to this rule have been recognized where the declarations deal with fraud[98] or ownership;[99] and the rule has been held inapplicable to subsequent testimony of the bankrupt or assignor regarding a set-off.[1]

b. Assignors of Negotiable Instruments

The competency of admissions against interest made by a former owner of negotiable paper varies according to the time of the admission, the time of the transfer, and other factors; and there is some conflict in the decisions relating to the competency of such admissions.

Admissions against interest made by the owner of a promissory note before he parted with its title or possession, and when he alone was interested, may be admissible in evidence against a subsequent holder,[2] or at least they may be admissible in certain situations, as explained subsequently in this section; but there is some authority for the view that the owner of negotiable paper cannot be affected by declarations of a former owner, although made before declarant had parted with his title.[3]

Admissions of a holder of a negotiable instrument, tending to show the existence of equitable defenses thereto, cannot be received as against a subsequent holder in due course.[4] However, admissions relating to matters which would be available as defenses in an action by a holder in due course have been held competent as against a transferee of the declarant,[5] although there is also authority for the contrary view.[6] Admissions of a prior owner are competent against a holder without consideration,[7] or one who acquired notice of the fact to which the admission relates.[8]

It is usually held that admissions made by the holder of a negotiable instrument before transfer thereof are competent evidence against one to whom it is transferred after maturity,[9] although there is authority for the view that such admissions are not competent.[10] Acts of the assignor after maturity, indicating ownership of the notes, or his statements with relation thereto, considered as acts, are admissible on an issue as to whether the notes were transferred before maturity.[11]

Admissions after transfer. Admissions or declarations made by a former holder of a negotiable instrument after it has been transferred by him are incompetent as against a subsequent holder,[12] except as they may be admissible on the issue as to whether one who claims to be the owner of the instrument is a bona fide holder.[13] It is incumbent on the person seeking to use an admission of a former holder to show that it was made before a transfer;[14] but it is not necessary that this should be shown by direct evidence.[15]

§ 334. Deceased Owners

A statement of a decedent in respect of personal property, whether a chattel or a chose in action, which was an admission against his interest may be admissible against his executor or administrator or other person claiming under him.

In Massachusetts

(1) In action, begun by decedent and prosecuted by her administrator, against street railroad for injuries to deceased passenger on boarding street car, street car inspector, who testified to a talk with passenger at station after she had been assisted from the car, was properly allowed to testify that passenger did not in any form of words speak of a sudden or jerky start of the car.—Carson v. Boston El. Ry., 33 N.E.2d 701, 309 Mass. 32.

(2) In an action by an administrator on two causes of action, one for conscious suffering of deceased and one for death, an admission against interest of decedent is admissible on the counts for conscious suffering and, while it is not binding on the administrator or the next of kin on the counts for death, the next of kin not being in privity with, or claiming under, intestate, it may, under statute, be admissible on both claims as declarations of a deceased person, if the preliminary requirements of the statute have been satisfied.—Eldredge v. Barton, 122 N.E. 272, 232 Mass. 183.

26. N.C.—Holmes v. Wharton, 140 S.E. 93, 194 N.C. 470—Dowell v. City of Raleigh, 91 S.E. 849, 173 N.C. 197.

Admission as to lack of support

Where there is no privity between deceased and those for whose benefit an action is brought as to their substantive right to recover, admissions made by deceased prior to the accident which caused his death that he was not contributing to the support of anybody is inadmissible.—Murphy v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., 122 S.W. 636, 92 Ark. 159.

fer[27] and in the absence of the alleged donee;[28] but statements of decedent that certain personal property belongs to a third person are admissible against a person claiming them by gift from the decedent where the statements were made before the consummation of any gift;[29] and statements of a decedent that he has made a gift of certain property are admissions tending to diminish his property and are admissible in behalf of the donee and persons claiming under him against persons, such as distributees or the administrator, claiming the property as part of the estate of decedent.[30]

Statements made by a donor of personalty after the consummation of the gift are not admissible to disprove or invalidate the gift.

The declarations or admissions of a donor of personal property, made after the completion of the gift, are not admissible to disprove or invalidate the gift.[31] The admissions of a deceased donor of personal property are considered above in § 334.

§ 336. Declarations of Debtor as Affecting Creditor

Statements of a debtor in disparagement of his title to property, made while he is in possession, may be admissible against an attaching or execution creditor, but declarations of the debtor are inadmissible against a creditor who seeks to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent.

Statements of a debtor while he is in possession of real or personal property and in disparagement of his title thereto are competent against an attaching or execution creditor,[32] provided the statements were made prior to the time at which the specific rights of the creditor as against such property accrued.[33] However, when such a creditor seeks to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance, declarations of the debtor are not admissible against the creditors on behalf of the alleged fraudulent transferee.[34]

§ 337. Independent Relevancy

The admissibility of independently relevant statements, whether made by privies or other persons, is considered in §§ 239–264 supra.

3. Transferor, on Issue of Fraud as to Creditors

§ 338. As Affecting Declarant

When not too remote, statements of a transferor indicating an intent to defraud creditors are admissible against him on an issue of fraud as to creditors.

On an issue as to the fraudulent character of a sale or conveyance with respect to creditors, statements indicating the existence of a fraudulent intent are competent against declarant, whether made before[35] or after[36] the transfer, unless the court

Before creation of debt
A rule more stringent than that stated in the text is that, for admissions of a debtor to be admissible against his creditor, they must have been made before the debt of the creditor arose; after it arose, although the creditor may not have acquired a lien or other specific tangible right in the property, his relation as creditor protects him against the impairment of his remedy to collect his debt by admissions or declarations thereafter made.—First Nat. deems them too remote to be relevant.[37]

§ 339. As Affecting Transferee

On an issue of fraud as to creditors, statements of the transferor are admissible against the transferee in some, but not in other, situations.

On an issue of fraud as to creditors, statements of the transferor may[38] or may not[39] be admissible against the transferee, depending primarily, see infra §§ 340, 341, on whether the statements were made before or after the transfer.

§ 340. Statements before Transfer

Declarations by the transferor in possession and before alienation are competent against the transferee to show fraud on the part of the declarant, but they may be rejected where there is no further evidence to show fraudulent intent on the part of the transferee.

Declarations of an owner of property in possession and before alienation are competent against his vendee to show fraud on the part of declarant.[40] However, such declarations alone are not sufficient to establish fraudulent intent on the part of the transferee,[41] and the court may properly reject them altogether, if no further evidence is forthcoming to show that fact.[42]

§ 341. Statements after Transfer

Subject to certain exceptions, as a general rule declarations of the transferor, made subsequent to the transfer, are inadmissible against the transferee on an issue of fraud on creditors.

As a general rule, declarations made by the transferor subsequent to the transfer of title and possession, and out of the presence and without the knowledge, of the transferee, are not admissible, on an issue as to fraud on creditors, to impeach the transfer or affect the title of the transferee.[43] However, it has been considered that where declarations of a transferor subsequent to the transfer are so intimately connected with other declarations made prior to the transfer as not to be readily separable therefrom, they may be admitted against the transferee.[44] Further, where a transferee ratifies or acquiesces in statements of his transferor, tending to indicate that the transfer was fraudulent as against creditors of the transferor, such statements are competent as against the transferee.[45]

Collusion independently shown. Where there is a design common to both transferor and transferee to defraud the creditors of the transferor, a species of agency is implied, and the declarations of either during the pendency of the common design and within its scope, whether made before or after the transfer and in or outside of judicial proceedings, are competent against the other.[46] The most usual application of this rule is to admit the declarations of the grantor or transferor, made subsequent to the transfer, against the grantee or transferee, where there is independent evidence of the collusion, conspiracy, common purpose or design, or participation by the grantee in the fraud.[47]

As a preliminary to the admission of such statements, the existence of a conspiracy or common design, or the transferee's knowledge of, or participation in, the fraud, must be independently and satisfactorily shown,[48] or there must be at least some slight preliminary proof of a conspiracy;[49] but a retention of possession by the transferor, beyond the time reasonably necessary to perfect a change of possession, sufficiently indicates the existence of a common design to defraud creditors to let in declarations of the transferor made subsequent to the transfer and while he remained in possession.[50] This inference is particularly strong in cases involving the transfer of personal property.[51] Where the fact of possession by the transferor at the time of the declaration is not affirmatively shown,[52] or where the circumstances of the case are such that this fact fails to give rise to the usual inference of conspiracy to defraud creditors,[53] the admissions of the transferor after the transfer cannot be received.

4. Agents and Other Representatives

§ 342. Authority to Represent Party in General

A party will be affected by the admission of another only where the declarant is expressly or impliedly authorized to represent and bind him.

A party will be affected by the admission of another where the person making the statement is expressly or impliedly authorized to represent and bind him as in the case of a relationship of agency or partnership.[54] On the other hand, in the absence of the existence of a relationship from which authority to act for another may be derived, the admission of one person is not binding on another.[55] Accordingly a party cannot put the declarations of his own agent in evidence since such declarations do not bind the other party in the absence of their knowledge and consent.[56]

"Declarations and doings of a third person, acting in the capacity of an agent, are excepted from the general rule respecting hearsay testimony. They are admitted in evidence against the principal, as the representations or acts of the principal himself, whom the agent represents, while engaged in the particular transaction to which the declaration or acts refer. They must constitute a part of the res gestæ in the course of his employment about the matter in question; they must accompany the doing of the business or making the contract, and must be within the scope of the delegated authority."—Lovell v. Underwriting Management Corporation, 153 A. 478, 107 N.J.Law 357.
Letters signed by the agent as such are admissible in evidence against his principal.—Chero Cola Bottling Co. v. Southern Express Co., 116 S.E. 325, 29 Ga.App. 656—22 C.J. p 367 note 99 [b].
Statements held admissible
(1) In suit to cancel oil and gas lease, declarations by lessee's employees, in complete charge of drilling operations, that drilling of eighteen-foot hole was all they intended to do.—Street v. Masterson, Tex.Civ.App., 277 S.W. 407.
(2) In action against physicians for malpractice, statement of physician employee of defendants characterizing operation of diathermy machine.—Wemmett v. Mount, 292 P. 93, 134 Or. 305.
(3) Statements by lumber company's agent to owner of house under construction that company was backing contractor.—Clem v. Forbess, Tex.Civ.App., 10 S.W.2d 223, error dismissed.
(4) Evidence disclosing negotiations and resulting contract was admissible as against party not present but represented by agent.—Henderson v. Dwyer, 13 P.2d 408, 36 N.M. 222.
(5) Where seller of goods which did not conform to the contract employed manufacturer to replace parts to the buyer, it thereby made the manufacturer its agent, and correspondence between it and the buyer is admissible in evidence in an action by the buyer for breach of contract.—Southern Border Motor Co. v. Fasken, C.C.A.Tex., 285 F. 24.
(6) Where scope of agency and authority is sufficiently broad, a general manager or superintendent may make an admission of liability which is admissible against the principal.—Davison v. Long Island Home, 278 N.Y.S. 167, 243 App.Div. 791.

edge,[65] but an authorized statement based on the report of others may be admissible.[66]

An agent's declarations, if relevant, are primary evidence,[67] and have been held competent notwithstanding the availability of declarant as a witness,[68] although this has been denied.[69] The death of the principal[70] or of the agent[71] does not render the agent's admission incompetent.

The principal is not affected by facts stated by his agent to him,[72] and not communicated to the other party,[73] or by declarations of the agent in his own favor.[74]

Reception against declarant. Admissions are competent against the declarant, although they were made by him as the agent of another person.[75]

§ 344. Proof of Agency

To render admissible the acts and statements of an alleged agent, it must be sufficiently proved, directly or inferentially, by evidence other than the statements of the declarant, that he was the agent of the party to be charged with the admission and that he was acting within the scope of his authority; but the court in its discretion may permit the admission to be introduced before proof of the agency.

Unless the agency is already apparent[76] or is expressly or impliedly admitted,[77] or unless the statement has been ratified,[78] the party seeking to introduce the admission must establish the relation of agency between the declarant and the person against whom it is sought to use his admission,[79] and the

Statements of the person charged may be shown to prove the existence and nature of the relation, if any,

but the agency of a declarant cannot be shown by the statement of another person, claiming to be an agent of the party sought to be charged, but whose authority is not shown to extend to binding his principal by such a statement.[84]

Order of proof. While proof of the agency should ordinarily precede the reception of an admission of the alleged agent, this is a matter resting in the discretion of the court, which may receive the statement subject to its being connected by a subsequent showing of agency.[85]

Sufficiency of evidence. The evidence on the question of agency need not be conclusive, but it is sufficient if it is such as would justify a finding that the relation existed.[86]

§ 345. Res Gestæ Statements

Generally, declarations not part of the res gestae, or made after the fact to which they relate and unconnected with any act of agency are inadmissible; but admissions made under authority and in the course of its exercise may be admissible although relating to a past event or although made before the transaction in question.

It is frequently said that the declarations of an agent affect the principal only when they are "part of the res gestæ;"[87] and that consequently his state-

Doctrine of res gestæ distinguished

(1) While statements by an agent bind the principal as an admission against interest only where the agent made such statements as part of an act or transaction in which he was then engaged as part of his duty, or as phrased in the text rule, as "part of the res gestæ," such admissions constitute an exception to the hearsay rule distinct from that of spontaneous unsworn declarations admissible as "res gestæ" regardless of the agency of declarant.

Vt.—Jones v. Gay's Express, 9 A.2d 121, 110 Vt. 531.

W.Va.—Reynolds v. W. T. Grant Co., 186 S.E. 603, 117 W.Va. 615.

(2) "Statements which form a part of the res gestæ, if made by an agent for either party, are admitted, not because of the agency, but regardless of it. The statements of a bystander, if otherwise admissible, are fully as competent as are those of an agent. . . . On the other hand, an admission may only be received in evidence if made by a party or by his agent authorized to speak for him in that regard. Whether or not an admission conforms to the requirements of the res gestæ rule is wholly immaterial. The two exceptions are quite distinct."—Semprini v. Boston & M. R. R., 179 A. 349, 350, 87 N.H. 279.

(3) Admissibility of spontaneous declarations of agent under res gestæ exception to hearsay rule see infra § 410.

In North Carolina

(1) It has been held that the statements of a driver immediately after accident as to whether he was acting within the scope of his employment are admissible in suit against principal.—Smith v. Miller, 183 S.E. 370, 209 N.C. 170.

(2) It was subsequently held that statements of such a nature are inadmissible since not a part of the res gestæ, and that Smith v. Miller, supra, was out of line with other decisions and distinguishable on its facts.—Pinnix v. Griffin, 12 S.E.2d 667, 219 N.C. 35.

However, as long as anything remains to be done in the transaction, statements of the agent made within the scope of his agency are competent as part of the res gestæ, although relating to a past event;[90] and like other res gestæ statements, considered infra § 413, his statements are received where, although made after the occurrence, they were made at a time when the immediate effect of the occurrence may be supposed to have exerted a controlling influence on the mind of declarant.[91] Also, where an agent is specially authorized by his principal to make admissions as to past transactions, such admissions are admissible against the principal if they were made in the course of the agent's employment.[92]

Statements made before the transaction in question, but relevant thereto, are admissible if authorized.[93]

§ 346. Narrative Statements

Generally admissions made by an agent in a narrative statement of a past transaction are inadmissible against his principal.

The rule which has been said to have been "succinctly and comprehensively" stated in Corpus Juris is that admissions made by an agent in a narrative statement of a past transaction cannot be received in evidence against his principal.[94] The

Negligence or cause of injury

(1) Statements by agent as to negligence or cause of injury to person or property are generally inadmissible if made after transaction in question and not part of res gestæ.

(3) However, it has been held that an official report of accident by driver to commissioner of motor vehicles may be introduced in evidence in action for injuries sustained in accident for purpose of proving an admission of driver.—Weissman v. reason for such exclusion is sometimes stated to be that statements of this character are not part of the res gestæ,[95] but a ground of exclusion quite as potent may be found in a consideration of the fact that it is ordinarily no part of an agent's duty to prejudice his principal by narrative statements construing[96] or otherwise affecting[97] his principal's rights or liabilities, or to discuss the propriety of his conduct even in relation to the subject matter of the agency.[98] However, as appears supra § 345, an agent may have such authority as to enable him to bind his principal by a statement as to a past transaction where such statement is made while he is acting in the course of his employment.

§ 347. Relation Must Exist When Statement Made

The relation of agency must exist at the time the statement is made in order to permit its introduction as an admission of the principal.

The relation of principal and agent must exist at the time the statement is made in order to permit its introduction into evidence as an admission.[99]

An admission made before declarant was employed as the agent of the party against whom it is sought to be used[1] or after such employment had terminated[2] cannot be received.

§ 348. Independent Relevancy

Statements of an agent, when made within the scope of his authority, may be competent because they are relevant facts which constitute the transaction itself, or because they tend to establish circumstantially the existence of material facts or of a relevant mental state.

Statements of an agent may be competent because they are relevant facts which either alone or with other facts constitute the transaction itself,[3] provided they were made within the scope of the agency,[4] or were ratified by the principal.[5] Thus where an agent makes representations,[6] accepts,[7] claims,[8] disclaims,[9] ratifies,[10] or waives[11] something for his principal, or acts as interpreter,[12] or makes a contract,[13] offer of settlement,[14] or ouster[15] for him, the agent's statements may be the facts which constitute the legal result.

A statement of an agent may also tend to establish circumstantially the existence of material facts[16] or of a relevant mental state,[17] although it was not made in the course of transacting business for the principal,[18] and amounted to merely a narrative of past events.[19]

§ 349. Character of Agency

An agent's admission may bind his principal regardless of whether his authority is express or implied or is secretly limited by the principal unknown to the person with whom the agent deals, but generally the admission must be within the precise scope of the purpose of the delegated authority.

The character of the agency between declarant and the party against whom the statement is offered may be such as to confer express authority on the agent to make admissions, and in such case the admissibility of the statement offered is clear.[20] So the statement of an agent acting for both parties, as to a matter entrusted to him for decision, is admissible.[21] Further, even though the making of declarations may not have been expressly authorized by the principal, yet if they were ordinary incidents of the position which the agent occupies, authorization will be implied.[22] So a party who seeks to benefit from a transaction engaged in by another is bound to treat such other as his agent and is affected by the latter's admissions in the course of the transaction.[23]

A general agent's power to affect the principal by his statements is not impaired by undisclosed instructions or other limitations unknown to the person with whom the agent is dealing,[24] or by the fact that the principal is ignorant of the agent's acts.[25] The scope of such an agency is extended where the principal is at a distance or out of the country.[26] Where, however, the agent's authority has been delegated for a particular purpose, the statements of the agent must be within the precise scope of such purpose.[27]

§ 350. Subagents

Admissions of a subagent within the reasonable scope of his agency may bind the principal.

While, as a general rule, a delegated authority cannot without the assent of the principal be itself delegated, see Agency § 136, it has been considered that admissions of relevant facts by a subagent employed by the agent, within the reasonable scope of his agency may bind the principal.[28]

§ 351. Particular Occupations or Employments

b. Maritime affairs
c. Mechanical occupations
d. Other occupations or employments

a. Insurance

An admission of fact made by an agent of an insurer binds the principal provided it was made in the course of the declarant's employment as to a matter within the scope of his authority; but ordinarily, an insurer may not bind the insured, nor the insured bind the insurer, by admissions not made by virtue of any special agency.

An admission made by the agent of insurer is competent against the principal,[29] provided, but not unless, it appears to have been made within the scope of the agent's authority[30] at the time when it was made,[31] and while he was engaged in the business of the principal,[32] and that it amounts to a statement of fact rather than an expression of opinion.[33]

Narrative statements of the agent of insurer are usually excluded,[34] although it has been held that statements relating to a past transaction, made by general agents possessing the requisite authority, may be competent.[35] A statement concerning insured's standing when he died, made in the discharge of official duties, is admissible on behalf of the beneficiary.[36]

A holder of accident liability insurance cannot bind insurer by his admissions.[37] Insurer cannot bind insured by its action where its agency to act for him is not established.[38]

b. Maritime Affairs

Generally, the owner of a vessel may be bound by admissions of the captain if made in the course of his employment, but not by admissions of a pilot, crew member, workman, or clerk having limited authority.

In maritime affairs the captain of a vessel is general agent for her owners, and his declarations are competent against them if made in the course of his employment,[39] although it is otherwise as to statements made after the transaction to which they relate,[40] or as to statements not connected with the transaction of the captain's business.[41] The owner cannot be affected by statements of a pilot,[42] members of the crew,[43] workmen employed for a specific purpose,[44] or employees who have only specific clerical duties to perform.[45]

c. Mechanical Occupations

Agents employed in mechanical occupations are within the rule that an agent's declaration will bind his principal when, and only when, they are within the scope of his authority and in the course of his employment.

The general rule admitting the declarations of agents when, and only when, they are within the scope of the agent's authority and in the course of his employment applies to mechanical occupations,[46] such as that of a superintendent,[47] foreman,[48] or chief engineer.[49]

The principal may be affected by the statements of an agent intrusted with the general oversight of manufacturing establishments, who has been commissioned to discharge the duty of the principal to provide safe and convenient tools and appliances for carrying on the work,[50] but mere superintendency of a number of men does not establish the relation of general agency to make admissions.[51] A workman cannot affect his employer by statements as to matters with which his employment gives him no concern,[52] such as the merits of the article[53] or the condition of the property[54] with which he is dealing. Neither are statements of employees in manufacturing or other mechanical operations as to the condition of the works, ways, or machinery of the establishment admissible against the employer.[55]

d. Other Occupations or Employments

Various occupations and employments other than those hereinbefore specifically considered have been held to render admissible or not to render admissible statements in connection therewith.

Bailment. While mere possession of property does not constitute a relation of agency so as to bind the owner by the holder's admissions,[56] an owner will be assumed to have conferred on his bailee all usual and customary powers necessary for the safety of the property,[57] and its proper and profitable use,[58] so as to render admissible his statements in connection therewith. So the declaration of one in possession of property as to the nature and character of such possession is ordinarily competent.[59]

Building. An architect is such an agent of the owner that his declarations, within the scope of his employment,[60] may affect the owner;[61] but a building contractor is not an agent of the owner,[62] although his admissions may be competent where they are independently relevant as to show the receipt of material, the rendition of services, etc.[63] The statements of a superintendent or foreman in charge of construction may be admissible as against his principal if in connection with a matter over which he has actual or apparent authority;[64] but he cannot bind his principal by an admission as to the general conduct of the work.[65]

Dealings in property. The admissions of an agent for the buying, selling, or leasing of property, when done within the scope of the agency and while engaged in discharging his duties, are competent against the principal,[66] but such an agent is not concerned with his employer's title to the goods which he is employed to sell.[67] The admissions of a vendor's agent are not binding on the vendee where it is not shown that the agent represented the latter.[68] However, where one is the common agent of buyer and seller, his admissions are competent in favor of either principal against the other.[69]

Interpreters. Persons who conduct a conversation through an interpreter constitute him their agent so that the statements of the interpreter, while acting as such, as to what each party said are competent against such party.[70]

Mercantile affairs. General managers may affect their principals by statements as to the ordering of goods,[71] the condition of goods sold,[72] the employment of men,[73] or the care and management of property under their control;[74] but their declarations as to their principal's title to his stock in trade are not competent,[75] and in no event are their declarations competent when made apart from the transaction of business for the principal.[76] A subordinate employee's statements as to matters with which he has no connection or authority is also inadmissible.[77]

Bookkeepers are presumably entitled to give receipts stating on what account property was received,[78] or to state whether the principal's books were correctly kept;[79] but statements as to the acceptance or rejection of merchandise,[80] or as to his satisfaction with the place where goods were stored[81] or as to other matters not within his authority,[82] are ordinarily not competent against his employer.

Collectors. Receiving a claim for collection implies, as a rule, authority to make declarations concerning its payment,[83] but mere authority to receive money confers no right to make statements about it.[84]

Sheriffs and constables. Sheriffs employed for the service of civil, as distinguished from criminal, process may affect the person employing them within the scope of the employment by statements made in a reasonable discharge of the duties of the agency;[85] but it is not within the agency of a sheriff to characterize the bona fides of a sale conducted by him.[86]

Declarations of a deputy or undersheriff affect the sheriff,[87] if made within the scope of declarant's official duty and while engaged in discharging it,[88] and when the process is in force,[89] and in the officer's hands, although service has already been made.[90] A sheriff who intrusts a constable with the service of a writ is affected by the latter's declarations while serving it;[91] but a constable is not, simply by having process committed to him for service, authorized by his principal to tamper with witnesses.[92]

§ 352. Reference to Another for Information

Admissions by a third person acting in accordance with his authority are admissible against one who has expressly referred another to such third person for information in regard to an uncertain or disputed fact.

A declaration competent as an admission may be made by one to whom the party to be affected by it has sent another for information on a given point,[93] where the person to be affected has indicated that declarant is authorized to speak for him,[94] as under such circumstances a relation of agency within the scope of the reference is established.[95] It is, of course, necessary that declarant should state facts rather than his opinion,[96] or what he has derived from hearsay,[97] and that the declarations should be made subsequent to the reference,[98] and should relate to the matters concerning which reference was made to declarant.[99] Such declarations are primary evidence,[1] receivable although declarant is available as a witness,[2] or after his death.[3]

§ 353. Form of Statement

The admission of an agent may be made orally, in writing, or by silence or acquiescence.

may be made in a pleading[7] or as a witness on a former trial;[8] but an admission otherwise incompetent is not rendered competent because it is made by a witness.[9]

§ 354. Agents of Private Corporations

A relevant admission of fact by an agent is competent against a private corporation provided that the making of the admission is within the scope of the agent's authority, in connection with the performance of his duties, and with reference to some pending act or transaction; but where requisite authority exists, an admission may be made as to a past transaction.

Admissions of an agent of a private corporation, when relevant to the issues,[10] are competent against the corporation,[11] provided, but not unless, they are within the scope of the powers of declarant,[12] were made in connection with the performance of his duties,[13] and are statements of fact rather than mere expressions of opinion[14] or personal attitude.[15] Such acts and declarations of authorized agents are admissible against the company even though the adverse party is another corporation of which they are also agents.[16] The rule, however, does not extend so far as to permit third persons to show statements made in confidential communications by the receiver of a corporation.[17]

As a general rule, the agent's declaration, to bind the corporation, must be made contemporaneous with or in the course of the business or transaction then pending.[18]

Narrative statements as to a past transaction are ordinarily not admissible against the principal.[19]

However, as a corporation, like an individual, may make admissions after the event, and as a corporation can act only by its agents, officers or agents possessing the requisite authority may affect the corporation by statements subsequent to the event.[20]

A corporation acting through its agents may not make an admission binding on officers or employees for whom it has no authority to speak.[21]

§ 355. Officers and Employees

The rule that the admissions of its agents bind a corporation provided the agents acted within the scope of their authority and in connection with their official duties applies to the admissions of officers and employees of either general or limited authority.

A private corporation will be affected by the relevant declarations of its proper officers[22] of general or limited authority, if made in the line of declarant's official duty,[23] but not by admissions made when declarant was not engaged in the discharge of his duties,[24] or which are beyond the scope of his authority,[25] or which are made after the termination of declarations of other agents, although the scope of authority of such officers is necessarily much broader than that of other agents.—Southern Surety Co. v. Declarations of director of a corporation are not binding on the corporation, unless they are within the

tion of his employment.[26]

Particular officers and employees. The statements of the president in connection with his duties as such are competent against the corporation,[27] and the same is true of admissions of the vice president,[28] the secretary[29] or the treasurer.[30] Corporate directors act as a body, and while their acts or admissions as a body are binding on the corporation, it is otherwise as to the acts or admissions of individual directors.[31] Trustees having charge of the assets of a corporation are general officers within the rule that the admissions of such officers bind the corporation.[32]

Admissions of the cashier are competent against the corporation,[33] if made while he was acting within the scope of his authority[34] and transacting the scope of his ordinary powers, or some special agency relative to the subject matter is shown.

business of the corporation.[35]

The rule admitting statements of agents of a corporation within the scope of their authority applies to general managers,[36] financial managers,[37] and other general agents,[38] such as superintendents.[39] The rule has also been applied to a foreman,[40] a sales manager,[41] an accountant,[42] a clerk,[43] a telegraph messenger boy,[44] the local manager of a telephone company,[45] a telephone switchboard operator,[46] a timekeeper,[47] a claim adjuster,[48] and a sleeping car porter.[49]

§ 356. Stockholders

The admissions of a stockholder, as such, do not ordinarily affect the corporation.

A stockholder, merely as such, is not an agent of the corporation, and hence his statements do not affect the corporation,[50] especially where such statements were made after he had parted with his stock.[51]

§ 357. Agents for Railroad Corporations

A railroad corporation may be affected by the admissions of its officer or agent provided that the agent was acting within the scope of his authority and in the reasonable discharge of his duties in the matter as to which the statement was made.

A railroad corporation may be affected by the relevant admissions of its agent,[52] provided the agent was authorized to act in the matter concerning which the statement was made,[53] and made the

§ 358. Agents for Street Railway Corporations

The statements or conduct of agents of a street railway corporation are admissible against it when made within the scope of their authority and in connection with the performance of their duties.

The statements of the general officers of a street railway corporation are admissible against it when made within the scope of their authority and in connection with the performance of their duties,[66] but not otherwise;[67] and the same rule applies to employees and other agents whose authority is more limited.[68] An agent's attempt to bribe witnesses may be admissible against the corporation.[69]

§ 359. Public Officers or Agents

Governmental bodies are not bound by the admissions of their officers or agents unless made within the scope of their authority and in the reasonable discharge of their duties; nor do the statements of public officers bind private persons for whom they are not acting as agents.

Statements of a public officer in the absence of express authority are not competent against the national[70] or a state[71] government; and even where the necessary authority is conferred the statement is admissible only if it was made within the scope of such authority.[72]

Public corporations, such as counties, cities, or towns, may be affected by declarations of public officers within the scope of their authority.[73] On the other hand, statements will not be admitted if not made within the scope of declarant's official duties and authority and in the reasonable discharge thereof,[74] and a somewhat stricter proof of authority of declarant is required than in the case of private corporations, by reason of the fact that the officers of public corporations are regarded as public officials rather than mere agents.[75] An inhabitant of a town is not in any sense its agent so as to make his admissions competent against it.[76]

A statement by a public officer not acting as agent of a private person does not bind such person, at least where he has not assented to such statement.[77] So admissions made by one public officer do not bind another officer sued in a personal action.[78]

§ 360. Particular Forms of Agency

The admissibility of admissions made in particular forms of agency is treated infra §§ 361–368. Admissions by agents in particular occupations or employments is considered supra § 351.

a. In general
b. Judicial admissions

a. In General

An attorney may make admissions of fact which will affect his client provided that the statement is made during the performance of duties of his employment within the actual or ostensible scope of the authority delegated and during the continuance of his agency; his statements may also be admissible as independently relevant evidence.

The rule in Corpus Juris, characterized as "supported by practically universal authority," is that an attorney may make admissions of fact which will affect his client,[79] provided his authority is made

"The trend of the modern decisions seems to be that an attorney employed prior to the institution of litigation is but an agent, and that his authority to make admissions for his principal is not affected by the fact that he is an attorney-at-law, and that if the admission is within the scope of his employment, he has the same authority to bind his client as any other agent."—Gibson v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., Mo.App., 147 S.W.2d 193, 196.

affirmatively to appear[80] by evidence other than the declaration of the attorney,[81] and provided the statement is shown to have been made within the actual or ostensible scope of the authority delegated,[82] during the continuance of his agency,[83] and while engaged in a bona fide[84] attempt to discharge the duties of his employment;[85] but it is no part of an attorney's duty to discuss his client's affairs with third persons,[86] and his admissions in common conversation cannot be received in evidence against his client.[87] Likewise, a litigant is not bound by statements made to him by his attorney in expressing his opinion as to the matters involved.[88]

Independent relevancy. An attorney's statement may be independently relevant and admissible because it constitutes the operative facts of the transaction.[89] Accordingly, even though an attorney's admission is not made under circumstances making it evidence against his client, it is admissible to show that the attorney knew the fact admitted.[90]

b. Judicial Admissions

A distinct and formal admission made by an attorney acting in his professional capacity on a trial binds his client as a judicial admission, unless withdrawn for proper cause; but such an admission is ordinarily incompetent in another action unless made without limitation to the purposes of the particular action in which it was made.

Judicial admissions are frequently those of counsel or of the attorney of record,[91] who is, for the purposes of the trial, the agent of his client.[92] When such admissions are made in the counsel's professional capacity,[93] for the purpose of dispensing with proof of some fact,[94] or modifying the severity of some rule of practice,[95] and to that end are distinct and formal,[96] they bind the client,[97] whether made during,[98] or even after,[99] the trial.

Admissions by an attorney may be received, even though they were made in the exercise of a wide discretion with which the client has as a rule so little personal connection as to establish in many cases no real relation of agency.[1] Thus, it is within the appropriate function of counsel to make admissions dispensing with strict rules of law or practice as to matters incidental to the issue, such as the formal proof of a corporation record,[2] or other document;[3] or as to facts about which the client cannot exercise a trained judgment, for example, what an absent[4] or deceased[5] witness would testify if present; or, in general, as to technical matters relating to the machinery of a trial.[6]

Admissibility in subsequent cases. The anomalous relations of agency existing between counsel and client impose an important limitation on the use of judicial admissions made by counsel when these are offered in subsequent cases. The original admission may have been made only with respect to the pending case to save time[7] or avoid a continuance,[8] or only provisionally to raise an issue of law, as on an agreed statement of facts,[9] a bill of exceptions,[10] a demurrer,[11] or a special verdict,[12] or in order to formulate a request for a charge to the jury.[13] A judicial admission by an attorney is therefore not so necessarily connected with the party as to be deemed competent in another action,[14] especially where the issues are different[15] and the parties not the same,[16] unless it was made without limitation to the purposes of any particular action,[17] or was ratified by the client.[18]

Withdrawal. A judicial admission made by counsel may be withdrawn[19] where cause for withdrawal is shown;[20] but the withdrawal relates only to the judicial character of the admission, leaving it such force as it may have as an extrajudicial admission.[21]

§ 362. Conspirators and Persons Acting Together

a. In general
b. Nature and object of statement

a. In General

The admissions of one party engaged in a common design or conspiracy may be admissible as against his co-conspirators provided the existence of the conspiracy or common design between the parties affected by the admission, at the time the admissions were made, is sufficiently proved by evidence other than the statements of the declarant, but the order of proof rests in the discretion of the court.

A community of interest and object between several persons acting together establishes a relation of agency[22] which may render the admission of one of them competent against the others,[23] although it proved by either direct or circumstantial evidence.[29] Declarations of one of the persons alleged to be engaged in the common design are not admissible to prove its existence,[30] but may be received in corroboration if sufficient evidence is produced aliunde.[31] Prima facie proof of the common design is sufficient and necessary to admit the statement; but the evidence need not be conclusive.[32]

The order of proof rests in the discretion of the court, which may receive the statement subject to its being connected later in the trial by a showing as to the existence of the common design.[33] Whether sufficient prima facie evidence of the existence of a conspiracy has been produced is ordinarily a preliminary question for determination by the court,[34] but the fact of conspiracy is ultimately a question for the jury,[35] who are also to decide whether the declarations were made in furtherance of the common design.[36]

b. Nature and Object of Statement

The admission of one party to a conspiracy, to be admissible against the others, should relate to the common object and be made while the declarant is engaged in carrying it out. A statement may be relevant in and of itself as where it tends circumstantially to establish the existence of a relevant mental state.

In order that a declaration of one party to a conspiracy or common enterprise may be received against another, it is necessary that such declaration should relate to the common object and be made while declarant is engaged in carrying it out.[37] Statements concerning past transactions are not within the usual scope of the agency conferred by unity of purpose,[38] and hence a declaration by a conspirator, made after the common purpose has been accomplished or the common enterprise abandoned, is incompetent against his associates,[39] and this is true even though it was made by him as a witness in court.[40] It has been held, however, that any admission of a co-conspirator, even though subsequently made, may be admissible to characterize the actions of the parties.[41]

Independent relevancy. The statement of a fellow conspirator may be relevant in and of itself,[42] as where it tends circumstantially to establish the existence of a relevant mental state, such as intent,[43] motive,[44] purpose,[45] or adulterous disposition,[46] and may thus affect not only declarant, but so far as connected with the statement[47] all his associates in the common enterprise, although it was made prior to the conspiracy.[48]

Act or declaration

(1) "An admission of one conspirator, if made during the life of the conspiracy, is admissible against a joint conspirator, when it relevantly relates to and is 'in furtherance of the conspiracy.' Construing the expression 'in furtherance of the conspiracy' reference is not to the admission as such, but rather to the act concerning which the admission is made; that is to say, if the act or declaration, concerning which the admission or declaration is made, be in furtherance of the conspiracy, then it may be said that the admission is in furtherance of the conspiracy."—International Indemnity Co. v. Lehman, C.C.A.Wis., 28 F.2d 1, 4, certiorari denied 49 S.Ct. 83, 278 U.S. 648, 73 L.Ed. 561.

(2) It has been held, however, that the fact that one conspirator tells another something relevant to conspiracy does not alone make declaration competent, but declaration must itself be in furtherance of common object.—U. S. v. Aluminum Co. of America, D.C.N.Y., 1 F.R.D. 1.

spouse may bind the other, provided they were made within the scope of the agency and in performance of the duties thereof and are not narrative of past transactions.

The general rule is that declarations or admissions of a husband are not admissible in evidence against his wife[49] in an action concerning, or which may affect, her separate estate,[50] unless she has assented thereto so as to bind herself under the rules stated supra § 294. Conversely, statements of a wife are not competent against her husband[51] even where he sues in her right,[52] or is sued for her acts or debts,[53] nor are the admissions of the wife competent against the estate of the husband after his death.[54]

However, the declarations of a wife, made before her marriage, respecting her right to property have been admitted in evidence against her husband,[55] and it has been held that declarations of a wife against her interest, in the absence of her husband, are admissible against the husband, who claims as tenant by the curtesy of his deceased wife,[56] and that in an action brought by the husband for the wrongful death of the wife, her admissions as to matters relevant to the issue may be shown.[57]

Actual agency of one spouse for the other, like any other agency, renders the declarations of the agent admissible against the principal,[58] provided they were made within the scope of the agency,[59]

(1) In suit by husband's judgment creditor to set aside alleged fraudulent conveyance of realty to wife wherein husband was merely a party pro forma, admission by husband that he owned realty, was inadmissible, in absence of evidence that, when husband made such statement, husband and wife had conspired to defeat creditor's claim.—Ibanez v. Joint bank account

The interest of a husband and wife in a bank account in their joint names is joint, and not that of mere tenants in common, so that letters written by the wife were competent as admissions, both against her and against her husband.—Hayes v. and while declarant was discharging the duties[60] thereof. The agency must be proved[61] by evidence other than the declarations of the alleged agent;[62] but this proof may be either direct or circumstantial.[63] A showing of a joint interest in land is not, however, sufficient.[64]

Narrative statements[65] and statements made after the agency has ceased,[66] are excluded; and the same is usually true of statements as to transactions occurring before coverture, whenever made,[67] although it is held that where the husband claims property which came to him from his wife through the marriage her declarations as to her rights, made before coverture, may be received.[68]

The disqualification of husband and wife as witnesses against each other, where it exists, may operate to exclude admissions of one spouse against the other.[69]

As against the declarant, the admissibility of statements is not affected by the fact that they were made as agent for his or her spouse.[70]

b. Other Relationships

The mere relationship of parent and child does not render the admissions of one competent against the other unless actual agency is shown; and the same rule applies to the relationship of brother and sister.

Parent and child. The mere relationship of parent and child does not render admissions of the child competent against the parent[71] or admissions of the parent or grandparent competent against the child,[72] although there may, of course, be such an agency as will make the statement of one competent against the other.[73]

Brothers and sisters. In the absence of special authority duly established by preliminary proof a person is not affected by declarations of his or her brother or sister.[74]

§ 364. Master and Servant

A servant's declarations are incompetent against the master, except in so far as an agency as to the subject of the declaration is shown.

§ 365. Partners

a. In general
b. Scope of declarations
c. Statements after dissolution of partnership

a. In General

If the existence of the partnership is sufficiently proved by evidence other than the statements of the declarant himself, the admissions of one partner or joint contractor are ordinarily competent against all the other partners or joint contractors.

As a result of the agency arising out of the relation of partnership,[77] the admissions of one partner or joint contractor as to matters of fact[78] are ordinarily competent against all the other partners or joint contractors,[79] provided they are made within the scope of the partnership business, as appears infra subdivision b of this section. The admissibility of statements otherwise competent is not affected by the fact that declarant has since died[80] or ceased to be a member of the firm,[81] or that the person to whom the declaration was made was not a member of the firm;[82] but statements made before declarant became a partner are not admissible.[83]

Proof of partnership. An admission is not competent against persons alleged to be partners of declarant until there has been affirmative evidence of the existence of the partnership[84] sufficient to satisfy the court that the jury would reasonably be justified in finding that the partnership relation actually existed.[85] It is, however, within the discretion of the court to receive a declaration as against declarant, subject to the condition that it may become competent as against his alleged partners if the partnership relation is established later in the trial.[86]

The statements of declarant himself are not proper evidence as to the existence of the partnership,[87] except as against himself,[88] and other partners present,[89] although it has been held that the partnership may be proved by the successive declarations of each of the several partners,[90] and the statement of an alleged partner may be used to corroborate other independent proof of the partnership relation.[91]

b. Scope of Declarations

To be admissible against the partnership, the statement must be within the scope of the partnership business, and in the absence of apparent authority a partner's statement cannot be used to show that an act or transaction is a firm matter if it is not one; nor are narrative statements as to past transactions admissible.

In order to be admissible against partners of declarant, the statement must be within the scope of the partnership business.[92] A partner's statements are ordinarily not admissible for the purpose of showing that a certain act or transaction was one within the scope of the partnership,[93] so that, when the form of the transaction is such as clearly to indicate that it is not a firm matter, the partner cannot make it such by his declarations to that effect;[94] but a partner's statement that he was acting on firm business may be admissible if made under apparent authority,[95] and in any case his statements are admissible to establish his own liability.[96] A partner is bound by statements in accounts and other communications sent out by a copartner, so far as the matters are within the scope of the partner's business,[97] but not by declarations in declarant's own favor[98] or as to his individual business.[99]

Narrative statements as to past transactions are not usually regarded as competent against partners of declarant,[1] although an admission as to the way in which an accident was caused has been received.[2]

c. Statements after Dissolution of Partnership

Although there is some contrary authority, it is generally held that admissions made by a partner after dissolution of the partnership are not competent against the other partners in the absence of prior authority or subsequent ratification.

It has been held in a number of cases that statements of a partner made after dissolution of the firm in regard to business previously transacted are admissible against all the partners,[3] although incompetent to create a new or additional liability,[4] or, alone, to prove indebtedness of the firm.[5] It is more widely held, however, that admissions made by a partner after the dissolution of the partnership are not competent against the other partners for any purpose,[6] in the absence of prior authority or subsequent ratification,[7] even though such admissions

Winding up business. Where one partner acts as the agent of the others in winding up the business after the dissolution of the partnership, his admissions, within the scope of such agency, are competent against the other partners, his principals;[9] but declarations not connected with the winding up of the business are not competent against former partners of declarant.[10]

tent of varying his liability[15] or of determining the rights of several sureties as between themselves.[16] It has been held, however, that the principal's admission of his indebtedness under a contract is ordinarily not binding on the surety thereon unless the latter agreed to be bound thereby.[17] It has also been held that unless the principal's admission is part of the res gestæ, it will not be admitted against the sureties being sued alone, although it will be admitted when the suit is against the principal and sureties on a joint obligation.[18]

Where the obligation of the surety is for the proper performance by the principal of the duties of an office or position, the declaration is competent only if made while the principal occupied such office or position;[19] but it is immaterial that he had been relieved, because of misconduct, from the performance of duties other than that to which the declarations relate.[20] Admissions made prior to the execution of the obligation,[21] or narrative statements made after breach of the obligation,[22] or after expiration of the time for which the surety is held,[23] cannot be received against the surety. The liability of the surety cannot be established by the principal's statement of what the surety has said.[24]

Representative of principal. Admissions of the personal representative of the principal or his recognition of the obligation are not competent evidence against the surety.[25]

An admission by a surety, when made in good faith and in connection with the obligation as to which he is surety, is competent not only against declarant but also against the principal.[26]

Form of statement. Competent admissions may be made by word of mouth,[27] contained in books or other writings,[28] or evidenced by silence or acquiescence.[29]

Principal and guarantor. The general rule is that admissions made by the principal debtor after a guaranty are not competent against the guarantor,[30] but a contrary view has been indicated where ing deposits.—Lane Independent Consol. School Dist. No. 1 of Jerauld County v. Endahl, 224 N.W. 951, 55 S.D. 73.

(2) Statement of treasurer to president of association as to what he had done with moneys given him for purchase of securities and with securities purchased.—Ft. Scott Building & Loan Ass'n v. McAfee, 10 P.2d 851, 135 Kan 355.

(3) In suit on bond of testamentary trustee who was also executor, report made by principal of his trusteeship showing that he had received no property as trustee was competent as showing in what capacity he was handling fund received by him.—State ex rel. Richards v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York, Mo.App., 82 S.W.2d 123.

§ 367. Fiduciaries

a. In general
b. Executors, administrators, and guardians

a. In General

While evidence as to admissions of a trustee have been broadly held admissible or inadmissible as against the cestui que trust, the test appears to be the scope of the powers conferred by the nature of the trust or the instrument establishing it; admissions by the settlor of the trust may bind the estate as against the beneficiaries.

A cestui que trust cannot be affected by the admissions of one who, although assuming to be trustee, was not appointed to the trust,[32] or has not fully qualified for the discharge of its duties.[33] It has been frequently held that even a trustee who has been duly appointed and qualified cannot affect the cestui que trust by his admissions,[34] unless they were made by the authority of the cestui que trust;[35] but there is also authority for the view that admissions of a trustee may affect a cestui que trust.[36] The true distinction is suggested by cases holding that the competency of any particular statement is determined by the powers conferred by the nature of the trust or the instrument under which the trustee is acting,[37] and by a consideration of the nature of the statement, see infra subdivision b of this section. Narrative statements,[38] and statements not made in the discharge of the duties of the trust[39] are in any case rejected.

Admissions by the settlor of a trust may constitute evidence of liability of the estate to beneficiaries of the trust;[40] but where the trust is irrevocable and has passed beyond the control of the settlor, his acts and declarations in derogation of the title of the cestui que trust are inadmissible.[41]

b. Executors, Administrators, and Guardians

While it has been held that an executor or administrator cannot bind the estate or its beneficiaries by his admissions, at least as to matters of which he has no first-hand knowledge, other decisions hold that his admissions are competent if relating to matters within his authority concerning the estate. Generally a guardian cannot bind his ward by his admissions.

Although it has been generally held that an executor or administrator cannot by his admissions injuriously affect the estate intrusted to his care or the persons who are beneficially interested therein,[42] it has also been asserted in a number of cases that admissions by such a person are competent against the estate if pertinent to performance of acts relating to the estate.[43] The distinction has been suggested that the agency of an executor or

Sole person interested

Where executor or administrator was only person materially inter-administrator, merely as such, does not extend to the making of admissions with respect to matters of which he has no first hand knowledge, as for instance the existence of an indebtedness by the decedent in his lifetime;[44] but where an action involves a transaction in which the representative, as such, and within the line of his duties, took part, his admissions in connection with such transaction are competent, as for instance where such a representative is sued on a debt lawfully contracted by him in his representative capacity.[45]

Declarations or admissions made before declarant had qualified as executor or administrator,[46] which are outside of the scope of his agency[47] or of his duty in discharging it,[48] or which were not made in connection with the discharge of his duty[49] are rejected.

Admissions of one of several coexecutors or coadministrators have been held competent against the estate,[50] although there is also authority for the view that such admissions are not competent,[51] either against the coexecutors or against the beneficiaries of the estate.[52] An administrator cannot, without his own consent, be affected by statements of a predecessor in the trust,[53] nor can the title of an owner of property be affected by an admission of the administrator of his predecessor in title.[54] An administrator may be bound by admissions of decedent with respect to a liability which is the basis of a suit.[55]

Guardians. Although it has been held that admissions of a guardian within the scope of his agency may affect the ward,[56] the more generally accepted view is that the interest of a ward cannot be adversely affected by the statements of his guardian.[57] Admissions made by one acting in his individual capacity before he became the guardian of minor children cannot be held binding on his wards.[58]

a. In General

While admissions of the insured are generally incompetent against the beneficiary, they are in some instances admissible, as where insured has reserved a jus disponendi as to the beneficial interest in the policy. Admissions of the beneficiary are admissible against him to show the falsity of statements by insured in the application for insurance.

It has been said that there is some confusion in the decisions on the question whether the admissions and declarations of insured may be received in evidence against the holder of the policy,[59] and that fine distinctions have been made in the admission or rejection of such evidence, each case often being governed by its particular facts.[60] As a general rule, admissions of the person insured are regarded as incompetent against the beneficiary to whom a loss is payable,[61] especially if made before the inception of the insurance contract.[62] However, the distinction is often recognized that where the assured reserves a jus disponendi as to the beneficial interest in the policy, his declaration may affect the beneficiary,[63] so that if the policy is payable to insured, or although payable to another, insured reserves the right to change the beneficiary, his admissions as to his health, which tend to show the falsity of material statements in his application, are admissible against his representative or beneficiary.[64]

Reason for rule

"The insured in such a case is not a party to the record, has no interest in the policy, and, if he is to be considered as the agent of the beneficiary in procuring it, his agency ceases with its issuance, so that there is no legal ground upon which his statements can be received."—Grangers' L. Where policy was payable to insured's estate, insured's declaration regarding change of beneficiary was admissible when estate sought to establish its rights to money.—Northern Life Ins. Co. v. Burkholder, 293 P. 919, 134 Or. 401, denying rehearing 283 P. 739, 131 Or. 537.

Statements held admissible

(1) Statements by insured relative to premium payments to keep policy alive or to reinstatement.—Equitable Life Assur. Soc. of the U. S. v. Campbell, 150 N.E. 31, 85 Ind. App. 450, rehearing denied 151 N.E. 682, 85 Ind.App. 450.

(2) Statements by insured in registration books and naturalization papers to show insured's age where it was claimed that he had misstated his age.—Messina v. New York Life Ins. Co., 161 So. 462, 173 Miss. 378.

(3) In action on accident policy, insured's declaration that he was not injured.—Benefit Ass'n of Ry. Employees v. Armbruster, 129 So. 78, 221 Ala. 399.

Where insured was equitable owner of cause of action on fire policies, his statements bind party suing on policies who is not a bona fide assignee for value.—Walz v. Fidelity-Phœnix Fire Ins. Irrelevant matter Statement with respect to a condition of health which did not cause or contribute to cause insured's death is, however, inadmissible since irrelevant to the issues.—Chavaries v. National Life & Accident Ins. Co. of Tennessee, Mo.App., 110 S.W.2d 790, 793, citing Corpus Juris.

It has also been held, without express reference to the foregoing distinctions, that it is competent to prove declarations intimately connected with the existence of the contract, as that it has lapsed,[65] or declarations tending to show that statements made in the application on which the policy issued were untrue,[66] at least where the beneficiary waived the right to object to the introduction of such statements.[67] According to some decisions, insured's admissions cannot be used against the beneficiary to show the falsity of statements in the application, although where other evidence shows such falsity, his admissions may be introduced to show knowledge of the misrepresentation.[68] An application signed by insured has been admitted into evidence to show the true character of the contract between the parties.[69]

The admissions of an employer having group insurance on the lives of his employees do not necessarily bind the employee's beneficiary.[70]

Admissions of beneficiary. Admissions of the beneficiary, such as with respect to the condition of insured's health are admissible against such beneficiary for the purpose of showing falsity of statements made by insured in his application for insurance.[71] Accordingly, proofs of loss voluntarily submitted to the insurer by the beneficiary are admissible against him as evidence of false representations made by insured in the application,[72] except where the statements contained in the claim were not authorized by the beneficiary.[73]

b. Mutual Benefit Insurance

In mutual benefit insurance, admissions of the member are generally admissible against the beneficiary if made as part of the res gestæ and not too remote from the time of the application if inconsistent therewith; but such admissions are not competent where insured reserves no right to change the beneficiary.

In actions on certificates issued by mutual benefit or fraternal societies, it is the general rule, notwithstanding some contrary authority,[74] that the declarations and admissions of the member are admissible against the beneficiary,[75] and accordingly such admissions may be introduced to show the falsity of statements made in the application whether made before[76] or after[77] the application. Under this rule a prior application for life insurance in another company is admissible to contradict insured's statement as to age, made in the application for insurance in defendant society,[78] although there is authority to the contrary.[79] So it has been held that, where there is independent proof tending to show the falsity of statements in the application, evidence of prior declarations of insured are admissible to show his knowledge of such falsity.[80]

Since the admissibility of insured's admissions under the rule stated above rests on the theory that during his lifetime he retains full dominion over the certificate and the beneficiary has only an expectant interest,[81] it follows that where the certificate is made payable in the first instance to the beneficiary, and insured reserves no right to change the beneficiary, his declarations relating to past events, and made after the issuance of the certificate, are not competent against the beneficiary.[82]

In order to render declarations of insured admissible to prove the falsity of his statements in the application, it is generally held that they must have been made at a time not remote from the time of the application;[83] and declarations not a part of the res gestæ of an act as to which evidence is admissible are not competent.[84]

E. PROOF AND EFFECT

§ 369. Laying Foundation

Apart from connecting or authenticating evidence, no foundation is necessary to render admissions against interest admissible as original evidence.

Apart from authenticating and connecting proof discussed infra § 371, it is generally held that no predicate or foundation need be laid for proof of an admission against interest as direct or original evidence.[85] Thus it is not necessary for proof of an admission to ask declarant whether he made the Necessity of foundation for impeachment of witnesses generally is considered in the C.J.S. title Witnesses § 480, also 70 C.J. p 799 note 19. Necessity of foundation for proof of inconsistent statements is considered in the C.J.S. title Witnesses §§ 598–602, also 70 C.J. p 1083 note 6–p 1090 note 71.

§ 370. Who May Testify

Oral admissions may be proved by any competent witness who heard them, or by declarant himself.

Generally a party's statements against interest may be proved by other witnesses.[88] An oral admission may be proved by questioning the party making it with respect thereto,[89] or by any competent witness who heard it,[90] even though the statement was confidential as to him,[91] unless, of course, it was legally privileged under the rules discussed in the C.J.S. title Witnesses §§ 252–314, also 70 C.J. p 376 note 39–p 472 note 8.

Reason for rule
The rule that a witness must have been asked when on the stand whether he made a statement about to be offered as a self-contradiction does not apply to proof of the admission of a party against interest, as the reason for the rule is to provide a fair opportunity for explanation before the departure of the witness, while a party is in theory present throughout the trial, and has ample opportunity to take the stand and make any explanation necessary.—Mindlin v. Dorfman, 189 N.Y.S. 265, 197 App.Div. 770.

Denial by party unnecessary
Declarations of a party as to the subject matter of the controversy, which are contradictory of statements made as a witness, are admissible without a denial thereof by him as a witness.—State v. Pulley, 82 A. 857, 82 N.J.Law 579.

Ky.—Cadle v. McHargue, 60 S.W.2d 973, 249 Ky. 385.

Patent infringement cases
In a number of patent infringement cases, however, it was held that admissions against interest are not admissible unless the party is interrogated with respect thereto when on the stand as a witness.—Esnault-Pelterie v. Chance Vought Corporation, D.C.N.Y., 56 F.2d 393, affirmed, C.C.A., 66 F.2d 474—General Electric Co. v. P. R. Mallory & Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 298 F. 579, certiorari denied 45 S.Ct. 94, 266 U.S. 609, 69 L.Ed. 466.

Attorney
Admissions of a party can be proved by an attorney for the opposite side.—Nye Odorless Incinerator Corporation v. Felton, 162 A. 504, 5 W.W.Harr., Del., 236—Jolls v. Keegan, 55 A. 340, 4 Pennew., Del., 21.

Admission at prior trial may be proved
(1) By judge.—Wilson v. Lewis, 65 So. 919, 11 Ala.App. 261.

(3) By adverse party in former action.—Williams v. Smith, 72 A. 1093, 29 R.I. 562.

Reference to bill of exceptions by other witnesses
It is proper for witnesses, testifying as to admissions made by a party, to refresh their memories by referring to a certified copy of a bill of exceptions taken at a previous trial, and, having sworn that the substance of their recollection is fairly set out in such copy, to incorporate it in their depositions.—Iglehart v. clude him from testifying as to the admission, although there is authority for the contrary view.[94]

It is not necessary that the witness should be able to fix accurately the date of the conversation in which the admission was made.[95]

Where an alleged admission was contained in a letter which has been lost, any one who read the letter may testify as to its contents.[96]

§ 371. Connecting Admission

To render statements admissible as admissions against interest they must be properly connected with the party against whom offered.

In order that a statement may be used against a party as an admission, there must be at least prima facie proof that it was made by him or by some person whose statements may legally affect him.[97] Where the admission is a written one, there must be some proof of the authenticity or identity of the writing,[98] the burden being on the party offering Extrajudicial admissions require proof.—Reid v. Owens, 69 P.2d 265, 92 Utah 432.

Establishing identity

Identity of person making extrajudicial statement may be established by circumstantial evidence or testimony of witnesses other than those proving statement.—Lundy v. Tucker, 130 S.E. 924, 34 Ga.App. 721.

Proof by declarant

(1) Making of statement, oral or written, may be proved by party's own admission when on stand.—Watkins v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 250 S.W. 350, 158 Ark. 386.

(2) In action for unlawful death caused by abortion, admissions by defendant that he told truth in criminal prosecution against codefendant physician justified admitting defendant's testimony given therein as against defendant.—Pleak v. Cottingham, 178 N.E. 309, 94 Ind.App. 365.

Admission by adoption

(1) Insurer, seeking to introduce doctor's affidavit as to cause of insured's death, must lay proper foundation by making at least a prima facie showing that the beneficiary furnished the affidavit.—Dickey v. Supreme Tribe of Ben Hur, 269 S.W. 633, 218 Mo.App. 281.

(2) In action on life policy, evidence was held insufficient to establish that physician's certificate obtained by defendant was adopted by beneficiary as proof of death.—Tennenbaum v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 252 N.Y.S. 599, 141 Misc. 394.

Corporate director

Admitting conversation of director, without pointing out particular director, was held not error.—Lahman v. Burnes Nat. Bank of St. Joseph, Mo., C.C.A.Neb., 20 F.2d 897.

Predecessor in interest

(1) To render declarations of predecessor in interest admissible, proper foundation must be laid by showing that declaration was made while declarant was holding title to property in controversy, that declarant was in fact the grantor of party against whom declaration is offered, and that declaration was against interest.—Osnes Livestock Co. v. Warren, 62 P.2d 206, 103 Mont. 284.

(2) In suit to enjoin cutting of timber and for trespass, certificate issued by defendant's predecessor, signed by him as "County Surveyor," showing correctness of map of plaintiff's lands, relied on as part of deed under which she was attempting to prescribe, amounting to a declaration admissible against defendants, privies in estate of the surveyor, where defendant showed that surveyor was in actual possession at date of certificate, which plaintiff disputed, was admissible over objection that it did not appear that it was made while surveyor was in possession.—Brookman v. Rennolds, 98 S.E. 543, 148 Ga. 721.

(3) In suit by heirs to recover land and to cancel deeds executed on administrator's sale by which title passed to defendant in possession, the admission of the purchaser that he was not a bona fide purchaser, but bid for administrator, would be competent only if there was evidence showing notice to last purchaser of invalidity of sale, if limited in effect to party making admission and not considered on question of notice to defendant.—Warner v. Hill, 100 S.E. 393, 149 Ga. 464.

Extent of proof

Person can be bound by written admission only on proof that he wrote it or that it was written by some one authorized by him to do so.—Castelo v. Castelo, Tex.Civ.App., 89 S.W.2d 1033, error dismissed.

Unsigned statements

Statements written by defendant's the writing to make such proof.[99] Letters offered as admissions must be affirmatively shown, otherwise than by regularity of business dealings,[1] to have been written by the party against whom they are offered, or by someone for whose act he is proved to be responsible,[2] either originally or by ratification.[3]

The trier of the facts determines whether an admission in evidence has been made.[4]

Use of interpreter to render oral admission admissible is considered in § 281 supra.

§ 372. Mode of Proof

Statements introduced for impeachment purposes need not be reintroduced to be available as admissions. The authorities seem not to be in accord on whether or not the pleadings in a case must be introduced in evidence for admissions therein to be available.

Ordinarily general and applicable rules must be observed in proving admissions against interest.[5] Where a statement of a party has been proved for the purpose of impeachment, it is not necessary to reprove it to allow it to be considered as an admission.[6]

While it is desirable that the witness should re-

Hospital record
Hospital record containing statement against injured party's interest has no probative value as an admission where source of information stated in record is not shown.—Franklin v. Nowak, 4 N.E.2d 232, 53 Ohio App. 44.

Pleadings
(1) Allegation of pleading signed and verified by party's attorney to be admissible as admission requires proof that party read pleading or knew its contents.—Usletten v. City of Brookings, 235 N.W. 705, 58 S.D. 303, affirmed 240 N.W. 851, 59 S.D. 477.

(2) Preliminary proof of authenticity of party's alleged answers to questions in writing is dispensable predicate to introduction of writing in evidence as statement against his interest.—Lewis v. Western Truck Line, Cal.App., 112 P.2d 747.

Pleadings in former suit
(1) Party offering abandoned pleading must lay proper predicate therefor by first showing pleading was filed by opposite party.—Abel v. Maxwell Hardware Co., Tex.Civ.App., 28 S.W.2d 312.

(2) Declarations, stating that accident was caused solely by defendant truck driver's negligence, in actions for personal injuries and damage to automobile colliding with truck, were held inadmissible as evidence in plaintiffs' subsequent actions against driver of another automobile also involved in accident, in absence of showing that plaintiffs personally made, authorized, or adopted such statements, which are assumed to have originated with counsel drawing declarations.—Jennings v Bragdon, 194 N.E. 697, 289 Mass. 595.

peat the exact words used by declarant, it is not necessary that he should do so, but he may state the substance of the conversation or admission,[7] although he cannot state his understanding of the admission,[8] or his conclusion as to what it would prove.[9] Where the party seeking to use an admission has shown that the statement was made under oath in a judicial proceeding in which it was relevant, he should not be allowed to go any further into the circumstances under which it was made.[10] However, it has been held that before an admission by a party or his attorney made in a former trial may be shown as an admission in a second trial of the same case, it must first be shown why the admission was made, the circumstances thereof, and its purpose.[11]

Where a person claims a beneficial interest under a written instrument to which he is not a party, not having signed it, his admission as to the purpose for which it was executed may be used against him without first proving the execution of the instrument by those who signed it.[12]

An admission of having collected money on executions is competent without production of the executions or copies thereof.[13]

A witness who testifies to an oral admission need not produce a memorandum thereof made by him at the time, unless this is required of him on cross-examination.[14]

Pleadings. Ordinarily, admissions in pleadings cannot be regarded as evidence unless the pleadings are introduced on the trial at the proper time and in the proper way.[15] In some jurisdictions, however, the pleadings in the action being tried are considered as before the court without being offered in evidence,[16] except as to superseded pleadings, which generally must be introduced in evidence to be read as an admission.[17]

Testimony at former trial. Admissions in a prior trial may not be proved by an unauthenticated record of the entire trial,[18] the proper method being proof by the stenographer who took the testimony or any competent person who heard the admissions.[19] A transcript of testimony taken by a private stenographer in a proceeding in which there are no official stenographers is admissible to prove an admission if the stenographer testifies that he correctly reported the testimony and transcribed it, but cannot remember the testimony without the aid of the transcript.[20] The mode of proof of former evidence generally is considered infra §§ 399–401.

Rule relaxed

"The admissions in the affidavit [of defense] were evidence for the plaintiff, and, while it does not appear that the affidavit was formally offered, these admissions were twice made the basis of objections to offers by the defendant, which had the effect of bringing them upon the record, as did the affirmance by the court of the plaintiff's point that under the pleadings and evidence the verdict must be in favor of the plaintiff. It is not the same as if the affidavit was a mere admission, which, with her attention called to it, the defendant might possibly explain away. By rule of court where the case was tried the affidavit was a pleading, of which the court took notice, and by which the defendant is concluded while it stands."—Hilliard v. Lyons, Pa., 180 F. 685, 686, 103 C.C.A. 651.

Oral testimony as to contents improper.—Pacific Const. Co. v. Cochran, 243 P. 405, 29 Ariz. 554.

Plea of guilty in criminal case

Witness may be asked, as admission of fact charged, whether he has pleaded guilty in criminal matter, and question and answers are admissible, if admission is competent evidence.—Dzura v. Phillips, 175 N.E. 629, 275 Mass. 283.

Particular methods

A fact averred in the statement of claim and not specifically denied in the affidavit of defense is an admitted fact, but does not become such for purposes of trial unless put before the jury in one of three ways: First, by the presiding judge stating to the official stenographer in the presence of counsel that certain facts which he details and directs to be placed on the notes of trial are averred in the statement and not denied in the affidavit, and hence must be treated as admitted; second, by counsel directing to be placed on such notes certain detailed facts which they admit; or third, by offering in evidence specific parts of the statement of claim with what counsel conceive to be the replies thereto contained in the affidavit of defense, and having the facts thus sought to be established placed on the notes of trial as admitted, because averred in the statement, and not denied in the affidavit of defense.—Buehler v. U. S. Fashion Plate Co., 112 A. 632, 269 Pa. 428.

§ 373. Duty to Show Entire Statement

Only such part of a statement containing an admission as is necessary to render it intelligible and give its true meaning need be offered, it being proper to leave to the party affected by the admission to show other portions which may weaken the force of the alleged admission.

A party who seeks to show an admission must give in evidence so much of the statement as will show the real meaning of the alleged admission,[21] and will not be allowed to show a part of a statement disconnected from other parts which qualify the language which it is sought to show,[22] even though a portion thereof serves the party who made the admission,[23] especially where the qualification is such as to deprive the language used of any real force as an admission.[24] Subject to this limitation, however, it does not seem to be incumbent on the party seeking to show an admission to introduce evidence of all that was said on the occasion in question,[25] or introduce in evidence the entire writing in which the alleged admission is contained,[26]

Use of memoranda to prove former testimony generally is considered infra § 399.

(4) Defendants were not required to offer the complaint to which the answer referred, which could not have affected the answer in so far as it related to the issue in question.—Redwater Land & Canal Co. v. Reed, 128 N.W. 702, 26 S.D. 466.

(5) In a suit by an oil and gas lessor to quiet title, where defendant lessee disclaimed as to all of the premises save ten acres, the lessor could not use the disclaimer to establish his title to all of the premises save the ten acres reserved in a release executed by the lessee, and at the same time attack the sufficiency of the reservation, the pleadings of the lessee setting up the disclaimer and reservation.—Osburn v. Finkelstein, 126 N.E. 11, 189 Ind. 90.

Entire conversation

In action for injuries to wife sustained when automobile driven by husband was struck by defendant's street car, defendant, in introducing testimony as to wife's statement to husband immediately after accident in which she admitted being at fault, should show the whole conversation, including the statements of the husband.—Friedman v. United Rys. Co. of St. Louis, 238 S.W. 1074, 293 Mo. 235.

22 C.J. p 344 note 81, p 412 note 19.

Duty of declarant

Under Pennsylvania practice, if an affidavit of defense only qualifiedly concedes a particular fact, should plaintiff offer it in evidence as if the fact were unqualifiedly admitted, it is the duty of defendant at that time to call attention to the qualification, by a proper objection, and, when this course is pursued, the court will not admit the evidence without the qualification; if it does, an exception may be entered in support of a future assignment of error.—Buehler v. U. S. Fashion Plate Co., supra.

Pointing out other part

Admission of part of statement is not error as against contention that all of statement was not given where objector did not point out other parts he wished given, and in fact other parts were given.—Holler v. Miller, 9 A.2d 250, 177 Md. 204.

Where an answer admits due proof of death, but denies that death was caused by accident, plaintiff may read the admissions to the jury, without reading the denial.—Jones v. U. S. Mutual Acc. Ass'n, 61 N.W. 485, 92 Iowa 652.

Pleading

(1) A party may offer in evidence a portion of his adversary's pleading containing an admission of a distinct and separate fact, relevant to the inquiry, without being required to introduce accompanying, qualifying, or explanatory matter, the latter being open for the opposing party to introduce.
N.C.—Lupton v. Day, 190 S.E. 722, 211 N.C. 443—Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Rouse Banking Co., 132 S.E. 468, 191 N.C. 500—Weston v. Royal Typewriter Co., 110 S.E. 581, 183 N.C. 1—Jones v. Norfolk Southern R. Co., 97 S.E. 48, 176 N.C. 260.
Pa.—Fichtner v. Fichtner, 99 Pa. Super. 584.

(2) In such case plaintiff offering part of answer is not bound by any part not specifically offered.—Crew Levick Co. v. Philadelphia Inv. Building & Loan Ass'n, 177 A. 498, 117 Pa.Super. 397.

(3) It has been held that the explanatory matter need not be offered at the same time if not modifying or altering the part containing the admission.—Wade v. McClean Contracting Co., 62 S.E. 919, 149 N.C. 177—Sawyer v. Roanoke R. & Lumber Co., 58 S.E. 598, 145 N.C. 24, 22 L. R.A.,N.S., 200—Lewis v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 43 S.E. 919, 132 N.C. 382.

it being proper for him to introduce in evidence so much as he deems favorable to himself, leaving it to his adversary to show other portions of the statement or writing which may weaken the force of, or are contradictory to, the alleged admission.[27] A fortiori he is not required to show statements contradictory to the admission made at other times.[28]

A party who introduces a letter written by his adversary as an admission is not bound to read into the evidence the whole correspondence in the course of which such letter was written,[29] and where a defendant has put in two answers, plaintiff may avail himself of the first as an admission without introducing the second in evidence.[30]

Depositions. One party may be permitted to read a portion of a former deposition to prove admissions by the adverse party whose deposition he has taken[31] or which has been taken ex parte[32] in the cause pending, leaving it to the other party to read the remainder of the deposition.[33] However, while a party's deposition, taken in a suit between different parties, may be read in evidence against him as an admission, the rule is that the whole deposition must be read.[34]

Contradiction of part of writing. The party offering a written admission is not bound by all the statements in the writing, but may take advantage of such as are in his favor and contradict the rest.[35]

§ 374. Explanation or Limitation

A party making an admission at the trial may explain to the jury the extent of the facts he intended to admit in the absence of prejudice. Proponent of an alleged admission may argue to the jury his theory of the meaning of language in an answer which he has offered in evidence as an admission.

When a party to an action makes an admission at the trial, he should be permitted to explain to the jury the extent of the facts he intended to admit where the adversary was not misled or put to any disadvantage in reliance on the admission.[36] A party offering affirmative answers of his adversary in evidence as containing admissions may argue to the jury his theory of what the language used means.[37]

The right of declarant to explain, rebut, or contradict admissions against interest is considered infra §§ 379 and 380.

(4) Where the statute requires each paragraph of an answer to be sufficient in itself, it is not error to admit in evidence against the pleader, as an admission, a single paragraph of an answer filed in a former action between the same parties.—Kentucky & Indiana Cement Co. v. Cleveland, 30 N.E. 802, 4 Ind. App. 171.

Reason for rule
"The rules relative to reading parts of the deposition I think proceed on the old ground that a party may always use the admissions of the other side, or their answers to interrogatories, without putting in the whole admission or answer, leaving it to the trial judge, or to the other side, to require the whole answer, if explanatory, to be read."—Matter of Van Ness, 139 N.Y.S. 485, 78 Misc. 592, 614.

Changed deposition
Defendant may read original testimony contained in plaintiff's deposition and elicit from plaintiff causes for changes made as admission against interest.—Wilson v. Marland Refining Co., Mo.App., 7 S.W.2d 442.

Pleading
No estoppel results from the use of an adversary's pleading as an admission, but the party may use so much of the pleading as operates as an admission in his favor and disprove other allegations of the pleading.—Mott v. Consumers' Ice Co., 73 N.Y. 543—Algase v. Horse Owners' Mut. Indemn. Ass'n, 29 N.Y.S. 101, 77 Hun 472.

§ 375. Right to Show Entire Statement

a. Party offering admission
b. Party against whom admission introduced

a. Party Offering Admission

The party offering an admission may show other parts of the conversation to enhance its effect and support the probability that it was made.

The party by whom an admission is offered may show other portions of the conversation in which it occurred, which tend to explain the admission and support the probability that it was actually made,[38] or to accentuate the admission.[39]

b. Party against Whom Admission Introduced

When part of a statement is in evidence as an admission, judicial or extrajudicial, the party affected thereby may offer the whole thereof in so far as it is relevant to rebut, explain, qualify, or contradict the alleged admission.

Where one party brings out part of a transaction, conversation, statement, writing, or course of conduct as an admission against interest, the other party may thereafter bring out the whole of it to offer his own explanation thereof and rebut its discrediting and damaging effect, even though proof otherwise incompetent is used.[40] Accordingly, where an oral admission of a party has been shown, he is entitled to show the entire statement which was made at the same time,[41] either by cross-examination of the witness who testified to the admission,[42] or by means of other witnesses.[43] If made in the course of a conversation the whole of the conversation bearing thereon may be admitted,[44] including what was said by both parties thereto,[45] if the statement claimed to be an admission cannot be properly understood except in connection with what was said by the other party.[46] However, only such parts of the conversation as are relevant to the admission may be shown,[47] and portions which are of no value in explaining or qualifying it and are otherwise incompetent as irrelevant or prejudicial should be excluded.[48]

Remarks and statements of witness. Where part of a conversation is introduced as an admission of the party, and in that conversation reference was had to expressions used by him on former occasions, he may bring these forward so far as they are required to render complete and intelligible the conversation first shown in evidence.[49]

In the case of written admissions, the entire writing, so far as it relates to the subject matter of the admission may and should be received in evidence,[50]

N.H.—McCurdy v. Flibotte, 139 A. 367, 83 N.H. 143.

Fact of insurance in accident case
(1) Reference to insurance as part of a statement by defendant admitting fault in accident should be excluded if it can be done without substantially impairing or affecting the natural force of the admission.—McCurdy v. Flibotte, supra.

(2) Testimony in personal injury suit as to defendant's statement that he had insurance covering damage was not admissible to explain testimony as to his statement in same conversation of how accident happened.—Kuhn v. Kjose, 248 N.W. 230, 216 Iowa 36—McDermott v. Johnson, 186 N.W. 630, 193 Iowa 19.

(3) However, it has been stated that the fact that, in a conversation wherein defendant admitted ownership of the horse causing the injuries, he said that the horse was insured does not deprive plaintiff of the right to show entire conversation.—Flieg v. Levy, 133 N.Y.S. 249, 148 App.Div. 781.

Pa.—Weaver v. Welsh, 191 A. 3, 325 Pa. 571.
22 C.J. p 414 note 39.

Reason for rule
"It is to the sum total that the speaker has committed himself."—

even though self-serving,[51] and where two writings are clearly connected, the admission of one renders the other competent.[52] It has even been held that a contemporaneous oral explanation of a written admission may be shown.[53]

Judicial admissions in the same[54] or another[55] action are subject to the same rule. Thus, when one party introduces evidence given at a former trial,[56] or shows statements contained in a deposition,[57] or in the pleadings in the same[58] or another[59] action, the entire statement with relation to the subject matter of the admission should be received. Hence, such parts of the testimony given at a former proceeding as are not on the same subject as that in evidence as an admission and which are not necessary to make understood or to explain that in evidence are properly excluded.[60]

Self-serving statements. The right to introduce the entire statement is limited to matters which tend to qualify or explain the admission, and does not extend to unconnected self-serving statements.[61] A fortiori, the party whose admission has been shown Holler v. Miller, 9 A.2d 250, 252, 177 Md. 204.

Qualifying elements

A part of a written statement offered against a party must be accompanied by all other relevant parts, and all parts possibly tending to qualify the admissions or to present the whole effect of what was said or written on the point involved must be given to the jury.—Holler v. Miller, supra.

Exclusion of part

Excluding evidence of isolated statement in income tax return was not error, where effect of whole return which is in evidence was at variance with it.—In re Williams' Estate, 258 P. 851, 145 Wash. 19.

Irrelevant parts

Plaintiff can at the trial read from a deposition taken on behalf of defendant, which was incompetent, admissions made by defendant's counsel in open court without permitting the other parts of the deposition to be read in evidence.—Lanter v. Southern States Life Ins. of Alabama, 104 S.E. 193, 114 S.C. 536.

As against codefendant

Where deposition of one defendant taken in another case was offered as an admission against interest as to such defendant alone, this did not justify introduction of many parts of the deposition which bore not on such defendant's liability, but related wholly to the liability of his codefendant, such parts being easily separable.—Vest v. Superseded pleading

The admission in evidence of certain sections of plaintiff's superseded original petition was not error where those sections were relative to further portions of that petition, a preceding paragraph of which had already been admitted at instance of defendant and were but explanatory thereof.—Joy v. Peacock, Tex.Civ.App., 131 S.W.2d 1012, error granted.

Inadmissible pleading

Such parts of a party's pleadings as do not explain or qualify other parts thereof in evidence as admissions are not admissible.—Bridgers v. Farmers' Banking & Trust Co., 152 S.E. 393, 198 N.C. 494—Weston v. Royal Typewriter Co., 110 S.E. 581, 183 N.C. 1.

Pleading

(1) Where only a part of a pleading is put in evidence as an admission, the pleader may not use other parts of the pleading to relieve himself from supporting its averments by proof.—City of Pittsburgh v. Pittsburgh Rys. Co., 83 A. 273, 234 cannot introduce his self-serving statements made on another and separate occasion.[62]

§ 376. Entire Statement to Be Considered

The favorable and unfavorable parts of a statement in evidence as an admission must be considered and weighed together, although it is for the triers of the facts to determine what weight to give to either.

When an entire statement is admitted in evidence, the favorable or self-serving part of it must be duly considered and weighed together with the unfavorable part.[63] However, all parts of the statement are not necessarily to be regarded as worthy of equal credit.[64] The triers of fact may reject such portions, if any, as appear to be inconsistent, improbable, or rebutted by other circumstances in evidence;[65] but they are not at liberty to ignore or disbelieve the favorable or self-serving part capriciously and without any reasonable grounds.[66] It has been said that they cannot believe part and disbelieve another part unless such parts are distinct and relate to different matters or facts.[67]

The assertion of a legal right to do an act, coupled with an admission that the party did the act, does not neutralize the admission.[68]

§ 377. Construction of Statements

The language of an admission should be construed in light of the purpose for which it was used and in connection with the circumstances, and it should be construed to include only such admissions of facts as are reasonably inferable therefrom.

Ordinarily the whole of an admission is to be taken and construed together.[69]

The language of a party should be construed in view of the purpose for which it is used,[70] and in connection with the surrounding circumstances and

Judicial admissions

(1) Under some statutes a judicial admission must not be divided against the litigant who makes it but must be taken for all that is said in the admission.—Daspit v. Sinclair Refining Co., 3 So.2d 259, 198 La. 9.

(2) Admission in an adversary's pleadings, to be available, must be taken with qualifications and limitations, and, where facts alleged in connection therewith nullify it, its effect as an admission is destroyed.—Johnson v. Bement, 235 P. 535, 109 Okl. 260—Oklahoma Moline Plow Co. v. Smith, 139 P. 285, 41 Okl. 498.

(3) Court must give due credit to all allegations of affidavit of defense offered in evidence by plaintiff.—E. J. Keller Co. v. Reading Co., C.C.A.Pa., 49 F.2d 33.

(4) In depositor's action on bank's implied obligation to pay deposit where depositor rested on admissions in pleadings, affidavit of defense pleading express agreement that money was not to be repaid would be considered, notwithstanding substantive defense based on new matter could not be considered, since scope of defendant's admissions are defined by denials and by affirmative allegations.—Dektor v. Overbrook Nat. Bank of Philadelphia, D.C.Pa., 10 F. (5) Defendant's admission, in action on life policy that policy was still in force, did not entitle plaintiff to recover thereon, where defense of misrepresentations was asserted elsewhere in affidavit of defense.—Boyle v. Eureka-Maryland Assur. Corporation, 176 A. 33, 116 Pa.Super. 61.

Conclusion of law
Employer's statement that injury to automobile salesman was received in course of salesman's employment did not constitute "admission" that salesman was engaged, at time of accident in which salesman's guest was fatally injured, in trying to sell the guest an automobile, which was only way in which salesman could have been so engaged as to impose liability on employer and its insurer for guest's death, such statement being a conclusion of law.—Hanson v. Engebretson, 294 N.W. 817, 237 Wis. 126.

Admission as to what witness would say is not admission of truth of testimony which would be thus given.—Lummi Bay Packing Co. v. Kryder, Mo.App., 263 S.W. 543.

Admission of contract implies merely its execution and not its contents.—Erdman v. Upham, 75 N.Y.S. 241, 70 App.Div. 315.

Admissions by counsel
Admission of counsel that there was no evidence that damage from flowage was because of logs, was not an admission that their presence in stream was proper.—Goddard v. Berlin Mills Co., 131 A. 601, 82 N.H. 225.

Agreed statement of fact
(1) Agreed statement of facts does not admit conclusions of law or of fact drawn therefrom.—Winn v. Herring-Hall-Marvin Safe Co., 126 S.E. 879, 33 Ga.App. 419.

(2) Admission therein that retention of title contract which was basis of suit was recorded did not admit that it was legally entitled to record, or that record constituted constructive notice.—Winn v. Herring-Hall-Marvin Safe Co., supra.

(3) Nor was admission that one party to case was chargeable with constructive notice as law might imply from record of instrument admission that constructive notice existed in fact.—Winn v. Herring-Hall-Marvin Safe Co., supra.

McCann Erickson, Inc., D.C.N.Y., 27 F. Supp. 491.

Inferences from conduct
(1) Employer's secretary's statement, that he would stop its contractor's trespassing, was not acknowledgment that contractor was servant.—Massee & Felton Lumber Co. v. Macon Cooperage Co., 162 S.E. 396, 44 Ga.App. 590.

(2) Where president of corporation placed checking account in his name as trustee for himself and one nephew, the balance to be paid to the survivor, action of nephew, after death of president, in placing account in his name and that of his brother as joint tenants, could not be construed as admission that corporation, in which nephew and his brother owned majority stock after death of president and of which they were executives, had interest in account.—Dougherty v. Dougherty, 2 A.2d 433, 175 Md. 441.

(3) Defendant's failure to respond to notice that note and guaranty sued on would be introduced in evidence merely admitted genuineness of signatures, but not that guaranty was guaranty of obligation evidenced by note.—North American Bond & Mortgage Co. v. Twohy, 293 P. 717, 159 Wash. 442.

Innuendo
Admission by defendant that facts alleged in telegram charging him by innuendo with crime of wrongfully disposing of mortgaged property were true, without admission that he committed crime as charged, was not admission of truth of charge.—Williams v. Equitable Credit Co., 126 S.E. 855, 33 Ga.App. 441.

Patent infringement
Although defendant admitted that a prior device infringed complainant's patent, complainant cannot in a subsequent suit recover on the theory that defendant's last device was a mechanical equivalent of the first, for such use of the admission is im-struction involving an admission as to the matter in question.[74] The statement is, however, competent evidence of all that can justly be inferred from it.[75]

In aid of the construction of an admission the subsequent course of both parties on the trial may be considered.[76]

The meaning or construction of a statement offered as an admission is ordinarily for the trier of the facts.[77] It has been held, however, that the construction of a concession as to a fact made at the proper, as it would allow the measuring of complainant's rights by the admission, instead of by the patent. —Universal Form Clamp Co. v. Taxis, C.C.A.Ill., 267 F. 578, certiorari denied Taxis v. Universal Form Clamp Co., 41 S.Ct. 14, 254 U.S. 642, 65 L.Ed. 453.

Lewis, 116 S.E. 542, 30 Ga.App. 76.

Validity of preliminary steps or proceedings

(1) Admission that valid patent had been issued carried with it admission that there had been a compliance with all requirements preliminary to issue of patent.—La Terre Co. v. Billiot's Shell Island, D.C.La., 20 F.Supp. 106, affirmed, C.C.A., 103 F.2d 53.

(2) Admission of validity of original assessment for water and sewer system was admission that necessary steps preliminary thereto were had.—Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission v. Scrivener, 137 A. 492, 153 Md. 68.

Admission of judgment implies validity of the judgment.—McCurdy v. Ryan, 76 N.W. 1079, 56 Neb. 511.

Facts admitted in pleadings

(1) The scope and extent of admissions contained in a pleading offered in evidence are for the triers of the facts.—Dektor v. Overbrook Nat. Bank of Philadelphia, D.C.Pa., 10 F.Supp. 894, affirmed, C.C.A., 77 F.2d 491, certiorari denied 55 S.Ct. 917, 295 U.S. 755, 79 L.Ed. 1698, rehearing denied 56 S.Ct. 82, 296 U.S. 661, 80 L.Ed. 471.

(2) Where plaintiff rests case on admissions in pleadings, in case of dispute, what the facts sought to be established as admitted are must be determined by court, and, as so determined, they, and not pleadings, become evidence for purposes of trial.—Dektor v. Overbrook Nat. Bank of Philadelphia, supra.

(3) If fact is asserted in paragraph of statement of claim, corresponding paragraph of affidavit of defense is to be considered only for purpose of seeing how far it limits or how much it subtracts from asserted fact, and remainder, after court has made subtraction, is the trial is for the judge and not the jury.[78]

§ 378. Denial of Statements

A categorical denial of the making of an admission is proper, such a denial raising a question of fact for the triers of the facts.

A party against whom an admission is introduced in evidence may categorically deny that he made such admission,[79] or may give his own version of the alleged conversation or statement.[80] Such a denial does not destroy the probative effect or value of the alleged admission;[81] it merely raises a question of credibility as between the party declarant and witnesses testifying to the admission for the triers of the facts to determine.[82]

§ 379. Conclusiveness of Admissions

Admissions against interest are sometimes divided into "true" admissions, which are conclusive, and "quasi" admissions, which constitute a mere item of evidence in the case.

Some cases distinguish between what they term "true admissions" and "quasi admissions," defined in § 270 supra, the former being considered conclusive and made to dispense with proof of the fact admitted, while the latter are considered as mere items of evidence in no sense final or conclusive.[83] It has been said that except when formally made at the trial, an admission is at most only evidentiary matter which may be rendered nugatory by other evidence in the case.[84]

§ 380. Extrajudicial Admissions

Except where estoppel elements are present, extrajudicial admissions are not conclusive on the party against whom offered. They may be explained, rebutted, or contradicted by proper evidence.

Except where the elements of estoppel exist,[85] an extrajudicial admission is not conclusive on the party making it or to whom it is attributable,[86] where testimony to the contrary or in explanation evidence.—Dektor v. Overbrook Nat. Bank of Philadelphia, supra.

Inferences from conduct

Jury could infer that defendant's payment for medical attention to plaintiff, injured in automobile collision, was due to representation by defendant's employee that he was at fault.—Watt v. Associated Oil Co., 260 P. 1012, 123 Or. 50.

Statement introduced by declarant

In action to determine insurer's liability under omnibus clause in automobile liability policy, insured's written statement, which was introduced through insured who admitted its truth, could be treated as affirmative evidence and master was not obliged to accept interpretation which insured placed on the statement in answer to leading questions by insurer's counsel.—U. Undenied explanatory evidence not conclusive

Where making of admissions was denied but there was no evidence that if made their author misapprehended facts, effect of admissions was not avoided as matter of law merely by testimony pointing to different conclusion, even though it was not directly contradicted.—Haas & Howell v. Godby, 125 S.E. 897, 33 Ga.App. 218.

Simple admissions not estoppels

U.S.—Martin v. Burgess, C.C.A.Ala., 82 F.2d 321.

Admissions acted on

(1) Generally admissions which have been acted on by others are conclusive against party making them as between him and party whose conduct has been influenced.—Long v. Robinson, 281 S.W. 78, 222 Mo.App. 503—22 C.J. p 417 note 64 [a].

(2) Rule that burden on plaintiff in attachment suit, to prove truth of facts in affidavit, is sustained by defendant's declarations justifying attachment, is inapplicable, where attachment creditor ignored affidavit of claimants and proceeded to sell attached property.—Long v. Robinson, supra.

Admission of principal as to surety

Amount of indebtedness

In mortgagors' suit against mortgagee for injunction against foreclosure sale and for accounting, mortgagee's admissions concerning amount of indebtedness due should have no more binding force than mortgagors admissions.—Federal Land Bank of New Orleans v. Brumfield, 187 So. 522, 185 Miss. 487.

Bailment

A statement made by the bailor during the negotiations for the bailment to the effect that the place in which the property was to be kept was suitable does not estop him to show the unfitness of the place.—Wolscheid v. Thome, 43 N.W. 12, 76 Mich. 265 (sheep sheds).

Liability

(1) In employee's action for injuries, payment of money in settlement and taking of receipt therefor was held not as matter of law conclusive admission of employer's liability.—Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Cline, 14 P.2d 495, 91 Colo. 255.

(2) In action by widow against chauffeur for death of husband in automobile collision, statement by husband that he placed no blame on chauffeur could be considered by jury as an admission against interest, but could not be held conclusive on question of chauffeur's civil liability.—Clark v. Farmer, 159 So. 47, 229 Ala. 596.

Value of property

(1) While a prior agreement between the parties as to the value of the property in condemnation proceeding has evidentiary value as an admission, it is not conclusive in determining the fair value to be fixed.—Albert Hanson Lumber Co. v. U. S., La., 43 S.Ct. 442, 261 U.S. 581, 67 L.Ed. 809, affirming, C.C.A., 277 F. 894—U. S. v. Gideon-Anderson Co., D.C.Mo., 16 F.Supp. 627.

(2) Report as to value of railroad property prepared by real estate dealer and submitted by railroad to interstate commerce commission is not controlling under the circumstances on question of value for tax purposes.—People ex rel. Lehigh Valley Ry. Co. v. Burke, 160 N.E. 19, 247 N.Y. 227.

(3) Value stated in bill of sale securing preëxisting promissory note did not conclusively establish value of property at conversion or between conversion and trial.—Odum v. Cotton States Fertilizer Co., 142 S.E. 470, 38 Ga.App. 46.

(4) In seller's suit for buyer's conversion of refrigerator accepted by seller as cash payment on purchase price, but left in buyer's possession, agreed valuation of refrigerator was relevant as admission by buyer as to value of refrigerator when agreement was made, but not conclusive of its value at time of conversion eighteen months later.—Pritchard v. Ballard, 173 S.E. 174, 48 Ga.App. 532.

(5) Price agreed on by parties to oral sale of property is not conclu-appears,[87] although it does have evidential value[88] and presents a question of fact.[89] The rule in this respect is the same regardless of whether the admission was oral[90] or written,[91] or is implied from the conduct of the party, as in case of silence or acquiescence.[92]

The party against whom an alleged admission is shown may introduce evidence to explain or rebut the statement[93] and thus diminish its weight as an sive of value.—Singletary v. Ginn, 121 So. 820, 153 Miss. 700.

(6) In an action for injuries to plaintiff's car, caused by defendant, a voluntary return by plaintiff to the county assessor, showing his automobile to be worth fifty dollars, admissible as an admission against interest, was not conclusive.—Donaghue v. Hayden, 208 P. 1007, 58 Cal. App. 457.

Receipt

A receipt given for an amount paid under an accident policy in payment of all claims under the policy as detailed in a statement of account delivered therewith, the correctness of which was acknowledged by the receipt, is evidence so far as it involves an admission on insured's part that he was only partially disabled during a certain period, but amounts to no more than an admission.—Browning v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc of U. S., 72 P.2d 1060, 94 Utah 532, rehearing denied 80 P. 2d 348, 94 Utah 570.

Tax returns

(1) In actions involving damage to realty the values in the assessment list for taxation made by the owner were not conclusive but had evidential value in determining amount of damage.—Bringardner Lumber Co. v. Knuckles, 108 S W.2d 511, 269 Ky. 567—Davidson v. Commonwealth ex rel. State Highway Commission, 61 S.W.2d 34, 249 Ky. 568.

(2) Appraised reproduction value of corporation's property in profits tax return signed by defendant was not binding on him, in action to set aside settlement.—De Roode v. Sheppey, C.C.A Ohio, 32 F.2d 634.

Suborning perjury or suppressing evidence

Mo.—Æolian Co. of Missouri v. Boyd, App., 138 S.W.2d 692.

Opinion of deceased

That deceased employee did not believe injury received in employment caused illness did not preclude recovery for his death, since he might have been mistaken.—Gulf, M. & N. R. Co. v. Graham, 117 So. 881, 153 Miss. 72.

Explaining inconsistent statements

In an action on health insurance policy, making statements of fact in proof submitted conclusive on claimant, evidence may be admitted to explain two contradictory proofs by claimant to secure payment of agreed indemnity.—Eberle v. Loyal Protective Ins. Co., of Boston, Mass., 239 P. 972, 119 Kan 399.

Wabash Ry. Co., Mo.App., 271 S.W. 851.

(3) In action on notes wherein maker asserted defense that plaintiff was not holder in due course and offered in evidence letters written by payee after maturity demanding payment, plaintiff was entitled to prove authority of payee to write letters for holder and pledgee in explanation of how letters came to be written and to neutralize inference that neither pledgee nor holder were in possession at that time.—Bondholders Securities Corporation v. Ayling, D.C.Conn., 22 F.Supp. 847.

Admission as to collateral matter

Empenger, 261 N.W. 185, 194 Minn. 219, denying rehearing 259 N.W. 795, 194 Minn. 219.

Parole evidence rule not affected

In partners' action against single defendant for services rendered, admitting partner's testimony that letter addressed to defendant and three others, tending to establish admission that contract was made with all four persons was so addressed at defendant's request, was not error as permitting terms of written instrument to be varied by parol, where letter was written after services were performed and did not purport to be any part of employment contract.—Christensen v. Relevancy must be shown

Where plaintiff introduced evidence that defendant's agent had attempted which does not in any way impugn or qualify the fact admitted is irrelevant.[9]

As discussed in § 382 infra, full and unquestionable evidence is necessary to overcome a clear admission, and it, until disputed, contradicted, or explained is, or may be, binding and conclusive on the party by whom made or to whom attributable.[10] If the evidence explaining an admission is sufficient to overcome or destroy the effect thereof, it can no longer serve as affirmative proof of the adversary or nullify other affirmative proof of declarant.[11]

Admissions of coparty or privy. Statements received in evidence because they are admissions by a coparty or by one in privity with a party, see supra §§ 314–368, are not conclusive on the party against whom they are introduced,[12] but may be explained, qualified, or contradicted,[13] to the same extent as admissions of the party himself. Where, however, the admissions of a party to the record are properly admitted against a coparty, the fact that declarant has no interest in the suit at the time when his admission is shown is irrelevant and inadmissible.[14]

Admissibility of counter declarations. It is generally held that a party against whom an admission is introduced is not entitled to show in rebuttal that at other times statements inconsistent with, or contradictory to, the alleged admission were made by him,[15] or by the person whose admission is attributo establish perjured testimony, evidence to statements of witness in harmony therewith to show good faith of agent would not be admissible, unless it was first established that agent knew that such statements had been made and had reasonable grounds to believe them true, and that relying thereon he did acts complained of.—Schaff v. table to him.[16] This does not prevent the showing of a counter declaration made immediately after the original statement which constitutes a part or continuation thereof,[17] under the rule discussed in § 375 b permitting the entire statement to be introduced.

Admissions by conduct or acquiescence cannot be rebutted by subsequent contradictory declarations,[18] but it is of course permissible to show that at the time of the statement claimed to have been acquiesced in, the party challenged its correctness.[19]

It has been held that written admissions may be rebutted by proof of other written declarations contrary thereto.[20]

Effect on proponent of admission. Except to the extent that the admission constitutes the only evidence on the point in issue,[21] the party who introduces in evidence an admission made by or attributable to his adversary is not bound by such admission,[22] certainly not by parts thereof favorable to declarant in evidence as part of the entire statement.[23]

Conclusiveness of evidence on the introducing party is considered generally infra § 1040.

§ 381. Judicial Admissions

a. In general
b. Concessions and stipulations
c. Pleadings
d. Testimony
e. Admissions by counsel
f. In other proceedings

a. In General

Unequivocal judicial admissions are generally conclusive on the party, but not, it is sometimes held, on the court. Some cases distinguish formal judicial admissions intended to limit the issues and those which serve as ordinary evidence in the case, the former being held conclusive, but not the latter.

The cases abound with statements and holdings that a judicial admission is generally conclusive on the party by whom it was made or to whom it is attributable,[24] if made in the case on trial,[25] and if unequivocal,[26] and unexplained or uncontradicted,[27] unless declarant is relieved from the effect of such an admission by reason of its having been made by inadvertence or under a mistake of fact.[28] Such an admission made in the case on trial constitutes a waiver of proof generally dispensing with the production of evidence by the opposing party as

Judicial admission is binding on person making it, but is not necessarily binding on adverse party.—Shea v. Hern, 171 A. 248, 132 Me. 361—Kimball v. Thompson, 122 A. 46, 123 Me. 116.

Court where made

(1) An admission of record is binding on the party, although made in another division of the court and for purposes of former trial.—Pennington v. Kansas City Rys. Co., 223 S.W. 428, 284 Mo. 1.

to the fact admitted.[29] However, it is held that such an admission is not conclusive on the court,[30] and it has been said that judicial admissions may be disregarded in the interests of justice.[31]

Some cases distinguish between formal judicial admissions intended to limit the issues or dispense with proof and informal admissions which constitute evidence in the case like any other evidence.[32] The latter is given prima facie force, but is not conclusive so as to prevent disputation by other evidence.[33] The former, however, is conclusive, removing the matter involved from the field of disputed issues and barring declarant from disputing it.[34]

An admission in a deposition taken before trial has been held not to conclude deponent on the trial.[35] If unexplained, however, such an admission has been said to be prima facie binding.[36]

An admission of a conclusion of law made during the trial is not binding on the court, trial or appellate,[37] or on the party by whom it was made.[38]

b. Concessions and Stipulations

Concessions or stipulations as to a fact for purpose of trial and intended as an act of waiver relating to proof are conclusive on the party making such concessions or stipulations, subject to his right to qualify their effect or probative force.

A concession or stipulation as to a fact made for the purpose of trial has the force and effect of an established fact binding on the party making the same,[39] as well as on the court,[40] unless the court in its reasonable discretion allows the concession to be later withdrawn, explained, or modified if it appears to have been made by improvidence or mistake.[41] It has been said that to have such effect the concession must be intended as an act of waiver relating to the opponent's proof of the fact and not merely as a statement made for some independent purpose.[42] A party is, however, entitled to explain or qualify the effect of an admission made in this way,[43] or he may deny the authority of his counsel to bind him beyond the particular case,[44] and the statement may be deprived of probative force by the consideration that it was not made as a fact but as a concession to obtain the opinion of the court.[45]

c. Pleadings

As a general rule, an admission in a pleading on which a party goes to trial is conclusive against him. This is not so as to admissions in pleadings which have been withdrawn, superseded, or abandoned.

Generally stated, an admission in a pleading on which a party goes to trial is conclusive against him,[46] unless altered by amendment,[47] or unless revoked for error of fact,[48] and this is true even though it results merely from a failure to deny an allegation to which a response is required.[49]

Some cases, however, have held that whether admissions in a pleading conclusively bind the pleader depends on the circumstances of each case,[50] and that under certain circumstances admissions in pleadings may have merely the force and effect of admissions generally,[51] and as such may be explained by the pleader,[52] but that, on the other hand, if public policy requires, the pleader will be concluded from denying the force and effect of admissions in his pleadings, regardless of the truth or falsity of the allegations constituting the admissions.[53]

Admission not relied on. It has been held that where plaintiff does not rely on an admission in the answer of an allegation in the complaint, but introduces evidence which has the effect of disapproving his own allegation, defendant is not bound by his admission.[54]

Withdrawn or superceded pleadings. Admissions in withdrawn, abandoned, superseded, or suspended pleadings are not conclusive on the pleader, but may be explained or contradicted;[55] such an admission must be weighed like any other admission.[56]

Effect on adverse party. The party adverse to the pleader is not bound by an admission in a pleading but may use it so far as it is in his favor and disprove the remainder.[57] However, a party failing to offer proof disproving such remainder is bound thereby.[58]

An admission in the pleading of negligence does not preclude a finding of willful misconduct.[59]

Effect as to coparties. Although a coparty of the pleader may be bound by an admission in the pleading,[60] where each of the coparties presents different contentions, the admissions contained in the pleading of one of such parties does not preclude the other from proving the contrary.[61]

An answer to an interrogatory relieves the adversary of the need of proving the fact admitted, but it is not conclusive and will not prevail over other evidence offered at the trial.[62]

d. Testimony

Admissions made in the testimony of a party while a witness in the case are binding and conclusive if deliberate and unequivocal and unexplained or uncontradicted.

There has been said to be a conflict of authority with regard to the effect of admissions made by a party in his testimony while a witness in the case[63] and it has been stated generally that such admissions should be viewed in the light of all of the circumstances and conditions proved.[64] However, the admissions of a party in his testimony are as a general rule binding on him[65] and preclude him from avoiding the consequences of his testimony by the introduction of, or reliance on, other evidence in the case[66] unless the circumstances and conditions give rise to the probability of error in the party's own testimony[67] or unless the effect thereof is avoided by some explanation.[68] To bring admissions of the party within this rule it would seem that they must have been deliberate and unequivocal,[69] that they relate to matters of fact and are positive and definite in their character,[70] and session of his mental faculties? (2) Was his intelligence and command of English such that he fully understood the purport of the questions and his answers thereto? (3) What was the nature of the facts to which he testified? Was he simply giving his impressions of an event as a participant or an observer, or was he testifying to facts peculiarly within his own knowledge? (4) Is his testimony contradicted by that of other witnesses? (5) Is the effect of his testimony clear and unequivocal, or are his statements inconsistent and conflicting?' It would seem reasonable that all of the circumstances related above should be taken into consideration in determining the conclusiveness of the testimony of the party to an action and perhaps such other circumstances as may manifest themselves in a different state of case."

N.H.—Harlow v. Laclair, supra.

Conclusive admissions

(1) Under circumstances, testimony of automobile guest suing host for injuries, that host was intoxicated at time of accident was a "judicial admission", which barred guest from disputing it either by host's testimony or by argument of guest's counsel, and required trial judge to direct jury to accept it as conclusive of disputed issue.—Sutherland v. Davis, 151 S.W.2d 1021, 286 Ky. 743.

(2) In automobile guest's action for injuries received when motorist drove automobile against center pier of viaduct on city street, wherein only defense was that guest was contributorily negligent in remaining in automobile with knowledge that motorist was intoxicated and motorist testified that he was not under influence of liquor, exclusion of defendant's offer of testimony of other witnesses to prove that he was intoxicated at time shortly after accident was not error, since motorist's testimony was given understandingly of facts peculiarly within his own knowledge and apparently honestly and in good faith.—Vondrashek v. Dignan, 274 N.W. 609, 200 Minn. 530.

(3) Act of lessor in removing a defect in a stairway in a two-apartment building after lessee of entire building fell and was injured could not serve lessee as an admission by lessor that the latter had reserved the possession and control of the stairway in the face of lessee's own testimony that she rented the entire building, such testimony being in the nature of a judicial admission.—Turner v. Ragan, Mo., 229 S.W. 809.

Admissions defeating recovery

One who admits positive and definite facts which defeat his right to recover is concluded by such admission and cannot complain of a direction of a verdict against him, if the admission is not subsequently modified or explained to show he was mistaken in good faith.—Stanolind Oil & Gas Co. v. State, Tex., 145 S.W.2d 569, modifying 133 S.W.2d 767, reversing, Civ.App., 114 S.W.2d 699.

Trimble, 52 S.W.2d 864, 331 Mo. 1.

General statements as to ownership

General testimony that property "belonged" to another does not estop declarant from asserting the true situation which shows certain rights in such property to be in declarant.—Bishop v. Lynch, Wash., 111 P.2d 996.

that they are made by a person of mature years and unimpaired mentality.[71] If it is doubtful that a party to the action comprehends his own testimony, or if it is so confused as not to constitute an unequivocal admission, it is not conclusive on such party and the court is not precluded from considering all the evidence.[72]

An admission in testimony dispenses with the necessity of proving the fact admitted.[73]

Some authorities hold that admissions in testimony are not to be taken as conclusively true, but only presumptively so,[74] to be taken as absolutely true and conclusive if unexplained and uncontradicted.[75]

A statement in the testimony of a party consisting of a mere informal admission not made to limit the issues or do away with proof is considered in some cases as having prima facie force but as not being conclusive so as to prevent disputation by declarant.[76] So a party is not concluded by a statement in the nature of an admission made on cross-examination which is inconsistent with the direct testimony, or with the other facts and circumstances in evidence.[77]

Where the admission is in the nature of an estimate or guess, it may be overcome by evidence of the facts and circumstances which form the basis of the admission.[78]

e. Admissions by Counsel

Distinct and unequivocal admissions made by counsel may be conclusive on the party unless withdrawn by order of court for good cause shown.

Admissions by counsel made in the trial of a cause

Statements not conclusive

The admission by a party on the stand that he signed a statement is not such an admission that the facts in the statement are true so as to preclude proof to the contrary.—Wright v. Mahaffa, 270 N.W. 402, 222 Iowa 872.

Reason for rule

"An honest party to a cause may make statements as a witness against his interest which he believes to be true and yet the entire balance of the testimony in the case show that he was mistaken."—Ephland v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 57 Mo. App. 147, 162.

As prima facie binding

(1) Admission in party's testimony, unless avoided by explanation, is prima facie binding.—Madden v. Red Line Service, Mo.App., 76 S.W.2d 435.

(2) Plaintiff's statements as a witness in his own behalf, which directly contradict material allegations of his complaint, constitute informal judicial admissions, which are accorded the quality of prima facie proof, and for the purposes of the action must be taken as true.—Van Meter v. Zumwalt, 206 P. 507, 35 Idaho 235.

Explanation of testimony proper

In action against joint tort-feasor, where plaintiff unwittingly testified he "settled" with other joint tort-feasor, admitting copy of covenant not to sue as explanation of testimony held proper, such document being in explanation and not contradictory of testimony given.—Finlay v. Plante, 160 A. 865, 52 R.I. 325.

75. Tex.—Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., v. Rodriguez, Civ.App., 125 S.W.2d 1069, reversed on other grounds Rodriguez v. W. O. W. Life Ins. Co., 145 S.W.2d 1077, 136 Tex. 43.

76. N.Y.—Manhattan Roofing Co. v. Hagedorn, 180 N.Y.S. 816, 110 Misc. 657.

Damages sought

A statement by plaintiff, while testifying in an action for injuries to his land, that he claimed no damages prior to a designated date, does not prevent an inquiry as to all damages not barred by limitations, for it does not amount to a retraxit, and does not show a contract for want of mutuality and consideration, but is a mere statement which ought to have weight with the jury in determining the damages.—Arthur v. Henry, 73 S.E. 206, 157 N.C. 393.

Wash.—Harry v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 178 P. 465, 105 Wash. 469.
22 C.J. p 423 note 11.

Opponent's admission

Defendant's admission on cross-examination consisting of estimates as to speed of automobile is available to plaintiff where plaintiff also gave vague approximations as to speed of the car in his own testimony.—Little v. Straw, 192 A. 894, 326 Pa. 577.

Admission as to balance due

In the buyer's action against the installment seller for trespass in repossessing furniture, the testimony of the buyer who said, "I reckon I owed him a balance on that furniture," was not conclusive against her, in the absence of evidence that she ever added up the receipts for payments, and it was for the jury to say whether anything was still owed.—Anderson v. Tadlock, 175 So. 412, 27 Ala.App. 513.

may be conclusive on the party[79] unless withdrawn or set aside by order of the court for good cause shown, such as inadvertence or mistake,[80] or lack of authority.[81] It has been held that to fall in such category the admission must be made for the purpose of substituting it for regular legal evidence at the trial,[82] it must be distinct and unequivocal,[83] and if made for such purpose it cannot ordinarily be withdrawn.[84]

f. In Other Proceedings

Ordinarily, and except for an estoppel, an admission made in the course of another proceeding or trial is not conclusive but may be explained or contradicted.

Unless elements of an estoppel be present,[85] a party to an action is ordinarily not concluded by an admission made by him or by one whose admission affects him, in the course of another action, but such admission may be explained or contradicted.[86]

N.C.—Turner v. Southeastern Grain & Live Stock Co., 102 S.E. 849, 179 N.C. 457.

Effect cannot be lessened by counsel's own testimony showing that admission was not authorized by client, and that it was made from statements of a witness whom he believed, and by whose affidavit, produced, it appeared that the witness did not state quite so much as was covered by the admission.—Perkins v. Douglass, 11 La.Ann. 471.

Opening statement
An oral admission of a material fact made by an attorney in his opening statement to the jury, if distinct and formal and made for the purpose of dispensing with the formal proof of some fact at the trial, is a solemn admission and conclusive upon the party making it.—Grimmett v. Grimmett, 195 P. 133, 80 Okl. 176—Patterson v. Morgan, 155 P. 694, 53 Okl. 95.

However, in the absence of explanatory evidence such an admission may be binding.[87]

The adversary is not bound by such an admission.[88]

An admission by counsel is usually binding on a subsequent trial of the same case,[89] unless the party is relieved therefrom on application to the court;[90] it is otherwise when it is reasonably apparent that the admission was made only for the purposes of the pending trial.[91] Such an admission is held not to be evidence against the client in another case,[92] nor to be conclusive on an appeal and trial de novo.[93]

§ 382. Weight of Admissions

a. In general
b. Sufficiency
c. Tacit admissions

a. In General

Although to be viewed with caution, particularly if oral, admissions should be considered and weighed like other evidence, in the light of all the evidence in the case, and if voluntarily made and clearly proved may dispense with the necessity of further proof of the fact admitted.

Although as has been considered in §§ 370–381 supra particular admissions may under some circumstances be conclusive on the party making them and preclude him from adducing evidence in contradiction thereof, where oral admissions are not of a character or made under such circumstances that they may be regarded as conclusive, they, as in the case of other unsworn statements which are discussed in § 265 supra, are as a rule regarded as evidence of the weakest and least satisfactory character[94] and hence to be received and viewed with caution and subject to the closest scrutiny, statutes sometimes so providing.[95] This is particularly true ant.—Kimball v. Thompson, 122 A. 46, 123 Me. 116.

Reasons for rule

(1) "Verbal admissions should be received with caution and subjected to careful scrutiny, as no class of evidence is more subject to error or abuse. Witnesses having the best motives are generally unable to state the exact language of an admission, and are liable, by omission or change of words, to convey a false impression of the language used. Furthermore, no other class of testimony affords such temptations or opportunities for unscrupulous witnesses to distort the facts, or to commit open perjury, as it is often impossible to contradict their testimony at all, or at least by any other witness than of admissions made by persons since deceased.[96]

Some authorities distinguish admissions reduced to writing, considering the latter to be entitled to great weight,[97] while in some jurisdictions statutes provide that all admissions be scanned with care.[98]

It is held in some jurisdictions that verbal admissions without corroborating facts or circumstances are alone insufficient to sustain a verdict or finding on a vital issue.[99]

The rule recognizing the unsatisfactory nature of admissions as evidence does not mean that such an admission may not constitute substantial evidence.[1] It may not be entirely rejected[2] without fair consideration,[3] and, if undenied when full opportunity for denial is afforded, such an admission constitutes substantial evidence of the facts admitted.[4] Furthermore, if deliberately made in view of all the facts to which it relates and clearly proved,[5] and if sufficiently clear and definite,[6] an admission is not necessarily weak evidence requiring corroboration,[7] but rather, whether oral[8] or the party himself. These and similar considerations have repeatedly led the courts to declare in substance that admissions are evidence of low grade—the weakest and most unsatisfactory form of evidence.' "—Sylvain v. Page, 276 P. 16, 20, 84 Mont. 427, 63 A.L.R. 528.

(2) "The rule is based largely upon the frailty of human memory, the danger of mistake, or imperfection in repetition of the statements, or, as otherwise stated, such verbal statements are 'easy to be misunderstood and difficult to be accurately reproduced.' "—Heflin v. Heflin, 113 So. 535, 537, 216 Ala. 519.

(3) "Aside from the danger of fabrication, verbal admissions are regarded as unreliable evidence, because experience shows that they are frequently misunderstood, imperfectly remembered, and inadvertently made"—Tousey v Hastings, 86 N.E. 831, 832, 194 N.Y. 79.

Burden of proof discharged
In suit on open account, in which defendant pleaded general issue, if during giving of his testimony defendant should admit that he owes a portion of asserted indebtedness, such admission would be of importance only to extent of aiding plaintiff in discharging the burden of proving its case.—J. D. Adams Co. v. Dauterive, La.App., 193 So. 506.

Opening statement of counsel
Effect of opening statement of counsel see the C.J.S. title Trial § 161, also 64 C.J. p 237 note 81—p 242 note 21.

Pleading
Facts alleged in complaint relieve defendant of necessity of introducing evidence to prove facts alleged.—Houghton v. Grimes, 151 A. 642, 103 Vt. 54.

Substitute for connecting proof
Where evidence is admitted on condition that it be connected by proof of some fact, an admission of such fact by the adversary renders unnecessary further proof thereof.—Fong Lin v. Probert, 195 P. 437, 50 Cal.App. 339.

As affecting title
Although title to real estate may not be lost by admissions, such admissions may explain partnership settlement paper and conveyance of coal mining rights as negativing the contention that only merchantable coal was sold, and to prevent one member getting an accounting twenty-eight years after dissolution.—Stevens v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 122 A. 504, 278 Pa. 284.

Effect on testimony of declarant
Ex parte written statements of plaintiff only affected the weight and value of her testimony so far as they were contradictory.—Worrell v. Worrell, 4 S.E.2d 343, 174 Va. 11.

Time of admission
In action against buyers for failure to accept and pay for goods, defended on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to show which of two orders had been accepted as the real contract between the parties, an admission by plaintiff in his correspondence with defendants, indicating his inability to determine which contract was the one upon which he actually relied, lost none of its force as such an admission from the fact that it "was written after defendants' cancellation."—Baxter v. "The effect they have, in reason and sound judgment, upon the mind of the jury, in view of their language, character, the time when and person to whom they were made, the circumstances and conditions attending their making, and the other facts in evidence, is the effect they should have upon the claim of the party. In case they were made in ignorance of the facts or in an abnormal state of mind, or were based in part upon mere opinion, or were made casually or thoughtlessly or insincerely, or under like or analogous conditions or circumstances, they may, in reason deserve slight consideration or value or none at all. In case they were made understandingly and deliberately, are of pure fact within the knowledge of the declarant, and were made under conditions and circumstances conducive to veracity, and are not overborne by the other facts in evidence. they may, in reason and sound judgment, establish a cause of action or a defense."—Gangi v. Fradus, 125 N.E. 677, 679, 227 N.Y. 452, reversing 174 N.Y.S. 903, 904, 187 App.Div. 934.

Persuasive evidence

In action for loss of eye, claimed to have resulted from negligence of defendant physician in wiping pus from ulcer in eyelid across open sore in eyeball from which piece of steel had been extracted, and affidavit made by the patient in claiming compensation from the employer was held persuasive evidence as an admission on his part as to the cause of the injury, although not conclusive.—Wood v. Vroman, 184 N.W. 520, 215 Mich. 449.

Admissions of enhanced or great weight

(1) Written statements of party made at or shortly after time of transaction will outweigh his later parol testimony given after controversy has arisen and when he is interested in different result.

(2) Letter voluntarily written at unsuspicious time is entitled to great weight.—Evans v. Independent Nat. Life Ins. Co., La.App., 148 So. 264.

(3) Deed by executor of one adjoining owner, conveying to himself as an individual and another land and recognizing existence of easement in other adjoining owner, was entitled to great weight in determining whether easement had been extinguished by virtue of prior deed—Tursi v. Parry, 5 A.2d 399, 135 Pa. Super. 285.

(4) Deceased's declarations are of great probative force where numerous witnesses testify thereto.—Loundry v. Lillie, 270 P. 1029, 149 Wash. 316.

(5) Other instances see 22 C.J. p 426 note 35 [c].

Admissions of little weight

(1) Vague and equivocal statements.—Baudenbach v. Schwerdtfeger, 230 N.Y.S. 640, 224 App.Div. 314, error dismissed Baudenbach v. Schlesinger, 166 N.E. 322, 250 N.Y. 555.

(2) Where title to realty is involved, oral admissions are received with caution and are entitled to little weight.—Roche v. Roche, 121 N.E. 621, 286 Ill. 336—Wells v. Messenger, 94 N.E. 87, 249 Ill. 72—Corder v. Corder, 16 N.E. 107, 124 Ill. 229.

(3) Statement of father that infants had been stillborn, without real knowledge of the facts, has little weight on the question of technical existence of infants.—Wehrman v. Farmers' & Merchants' Sav. Bank of Durant, 259 N.W. 564, 221 Iowa 249, rehearing overruled 266 N.W. 290, 221 Iowa 249.

(4) In determining whether holder had been guilty of willful concealment in procuring naturalization certificate, little weight could be attached to admission contained in statement secured by government agents where person who interpreted questions and answers upon which statement was based had very poor understanding of holder's Italian dialect.—U. S. v. Petrucci, D.C.Pa., 23 F.Supp. 687.

Circumstances detracting from weight

(1) Fact that plaintiff was hysterical when making admissions affects weight and credibility thereof.—Friedman v. United Rys. Co. of St. Louis, 238 S.W. 1074, 293 Mo. 235.

(2) In an action on a benefit certificate, a statement in the proofs of death furnished by plaintiff that deceased committed suicide is deprived of its binding force by plaintiff's testimony that, in making the statement in the proofs, she relied upon statements of physicians who attended deceased, and not on her own personal knowledge of the facts.—Dickey v. Supreme Tribe of Ben Hur, 269 S.W. 633, 218 Mo.App. 281—Dickey v. Supreme Tribe of Ben Hur, Mo.App., 253 S.W. 417.

(3) Employee's statement to doctor that employee had had an attack of "flu," without medical or scientific proof, would not constitute an "admission" of any probative value in determining whether bronchiectasis arose out of and in course of employment or resulted from flu.—Hirst v. Chevrolet Muncie Division of General Motors Corporation, Ind.App., 33 N.E.2d 773.

(4) Statements consisting of casual remarks made approximately thirty years before trial are of slight probative value.—Tichenor v. Bowman, Mo., 133 S.W.2d 324.

(5) Statement of driver, allegedly made shortly after crash, that he must have been asleep when his automobile collided with car at railroad crossing, was of no evidentiary value, where driver was practically unconscious until he arrived at hospital and driver testified positively that he was not asleep.—Los Angeles & S. L. R. Co. v. Lytle, 52 P.2d 464, 56 Nev. 192, denying rehearing 47 P.2d 934, 56 Nev. 192.

Effect of contrary evidence not destroyed—Swift v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., Mo.App., 15 S.W.2d 964.

Weight accorded admission

(1) Declarations of deceased in a death action are not given much weight where the evidence clearly shows that defendant was guilty of gross negligence.—Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Pingenot, Tex.Civ.App., 142 S.W. 93.

(2) Admissions of grantor, to prove parol gift or sale of land between parent and child, should have little weight attached to them as against any act of grantor inconsistent therewith—Purvis v. Malloy, for Use and Benefit of Tiller, 176 So. 71, 129 Fla. 191.

(3) Statements, in nature of conclusions and of intentions, not disclosed by adequate language, have little weight when opposed to definite statements and specific conversations in favor of adverse parties.—Pannell v. Glidewell, 107 So. 273, 142 Miss. 77.

(4) Notes executed by plaintiff in behalf of another, expressly given in payment for conveyance, were persuasive evidence against plaintiff's claim in property conveyed.—Lee v. Lee, 11 S.W.2d 956, 226 Ky. 776.

Ownership

Statements of insured to employee of fire marshal as to ownership of insured property made subsequent to fire in which property was destroyed could not affect insured's ownership, as respects right to recover on fire policy, where her ownership was absolute and unconditional.—France v. Firemen's Ins. Co. of Newark, La.App., 170 So. 424.

ment relied on as an admission was not true.[24] The effect of an admission is not impaired by the existence of a written agreement with respect to the matter involved therein which is in the possession of declarant,[25] or by a statement, in connection therewith, in the nature of a protest against the admitted fact.[26]

With relation to self-serving declaration. Where self-serving declarations are in evidence because part of the writing containing admissions, the latter is entitled to more weight than the former.[27]

b. Sufficiency

Evidence of an admission in light of the circumstances or other evidence in the case may be sufficient to establish the fact admitted or the cause of action or defense depending on such fact.

In the absence of opposing evidence or in the light of the surrounding circumstances or other evidence in the case, an admission against interest may be sufficient to establish the fact admitted,[28]

Self-serving declaration insufficient
A written statement by stockholders to their client that his stock had been sold for a particular price was sufficient to establish that for which it was offered in evidence.[31]

Admission of fault or liability. Where admissible, see supra § 272, an admission of fault or liability has probative force.[32] However, a mere acknowledgment of fault or liability is insufficient to establish the same if there is no liability or actionable fault present as a matter of law,[33] as where such admission is made in ignorance of declarant's rights and responsibilities.[34] Similarly plaintiff's statement at the time of the incident, that defendant was not at fault, is not conclusive so as to preclude recovery, such statement being as to a question of law.[35] Nevertheless such an admission of fault coupled with facts which may constitute liability in law may be sufficient to support a finding of liability.[36]

Admissions as proof of gift. Admissions of an alleged donor with respect to a gift are not in themselves sufficient evidence to establish the gift,[37] especially where his acts are inconsistent with his having parted with possession and control of the property;[38] nor are they sufficient to disprove a gift otherwise shown to have been made.[39] However, they are to be weighed by the trier of the facts and, when considered together with other corroborative evidence showing a delivery of possession, and an absolute parting of all dominion or interest in the subject of the gift, may be sufficient to establish the gift.[40]

Where the donor repeatedly declared his intention to make a certain gift, subsequent admissions that he had made the gift are sufficient evidence of an actual delivery to complete the title of the donee.[41]

A donee's admissions may be sufficient to negative a gift.[42]

Conspirator's confession. The confession of one of the conspirators without corroboration is insufficient to establish a cause of action or defense arising out of a conspiracy involving another of the alleged conspirators.[43]

c. Tacit Admissions

Tacit admissions may be just as effective as oral or written admissions to establish the fact admitted, but their weight depends on the circumstances.

While an admission by conduct, silence, or acquiescence may be as effective as an oral or written admission would be,[44] its weight depends very largely on the surrounding circumstances, and, in the case of silence, on the probability of a denial if the statements were untrue.[45] Under some circuman admission conclusive as direct evidence against the brokers and was not overcome by a subsequent letter written by the stockholders stating that the sale had not been made, since the letter was self-serving evidence.—Vollmer v. Newburger, 121 A. 56, 277 Pa. 282.

stances a party's silence may militate against him,[46] but an adverse inference from conduct or silence is to be drawn with extreme caution,[47] especially where the statement was made by a stranger to the controversy.[48] It is for the jury to determine the weight to be accorded to such an admission.[49]

The admission implicit in an attempt to bribe a witness constitutes corroborative evidence as distinguished from substantive evidence.[50]

The same probative effect is not necessarily given to a failure to reply to a written communication as is given to a failure to reply to oral statements made in the presence of the party.[51] Failure to deny a statement in a written communication is merely a circumstance to be weighed in connection with other evidence bearing on the correctness of the statement,[52] usually having less probative force than would attach to a failure to reply to an oral statement made directly to the party.[53]

§ 383. To Which Party Available

An admission in evidence may be used by either side in support of its views.

Where an admission has been introduced into evidence and thus brought into the case, it may be used by either side in support of its views.[54]

IX. FORMER EVIDENCE

§ 384. In General

Under certain conditions, evidence taken at a former trial may be introduced at a subsequent trial, irrespective of the outcome of the former trial.

The mere fact that testimony has been given in the course of a former proceeding between the parties to a case on trial is no ground for admitting it in evidence.[55] Such former evidence is second-

Facts within party's knowledge

(1) Silence of party on subject material to her case, and peculiarly within her knowledge, furnishes strong and often conclusive evidence that she does not speak lest truth hurt her cause.—Kolensky v. De Francesco, 129 A. 777, 102 Conn. 660.

(2) Where the facts are peculiarly within his knowledge, silence of bankrupt on petition by trustee in bankruptcy for turnover order is most persuasive evidence, and must be taken strongly against him.—In re Glassberg, D.C.N.Y., 59 F.2d 209.

Failure to assert claim at a time when its assertion might reasonably have been expected is a matter proper for consideration on an issue as to the existence or validity of such claim.—Chidester v. Harlan, 159 N. W. 659, 180 Iowa 171.

(2) Showing that necessary witness has been kept away is persuasive, not probative, evidence.—Login v. Waisman, 136 A. 134, 82 N.H. 500.

Cross-examination as to testimony on former trial

Questions to defendant's witness on cross-examination as to what another witness for defendant, who did not testify in the present trial, testified to in the former trial of the case, were improper and prejudicial. —Walter v. Joline, 120 N.Y.S. 1025, 136 App.Div. 426.

ary evidence,[56] and has been characterized as hearsay evidence.[57]

When, however, as frequently happens, it is impossible to produce on a trial evidence which was introduced at a previous trial, the former evidence is, as a matter of necessity,[58] received,[59] sometimes by express statutory permission,[60] if it is relevant and material on the later trial,[61] and provided further certain conditions discussed hereafter in §§ 385–396 are found to exist.

It is immaterial to the admission of former evidence what was the outcome of the former trial or suit in which the witness was examined,[62] but the evidence may be received whether the former action was abandoned,[63] dismissed,[64] terminated by a nonsuit,[65] or for other reason failed to result in a decision.[66] The evidence is not to be rejected

"The admission of the testimony of a witness on a former trial is frequently inaccurately spoken of as an exception to the rule against the admission of hearsay evidence. The analogy is not at all perfect. Objections to hearsay evidence consist of the want of the sanction of an oath and of an opportunity to cross-examine the witness. These two objections do not apply where former testimony is sought to be introduced in evidence. In the latter case the testimony is taken down word for word at a former trial and preserved. The testimony is taken in open court in the presence of the parties and witnesses under the supervision of the trial judge under oath of the witness where there is full opportunity to examine and cross-examine the witness, to search his motives, appeal to his conscience, and test his recollection and the accuracy of his statements. So taken it must be as high an order of testimony as a deposition taken upon interrogatories in the private office of a notary public or some like officer."—Habig v. Bastian, 158 So. 508, 510, 117 Fla. 864.

Testimony excluded as hearsay

Testimony of a witness that she heard witness testify on a former trial that he had written certain letters and the letters themselves are properly excluded as hearsay.—Estill v. Citizens' & Southern Bank, 113 S.E. 552, 153 Ga. 618.

because there is other evidence to the same effect,[67] or because it was not offered at a former retrial at which it would have been available.[68] It is not a valid objection that the testimony was in the witness' favor.[69]

The former evidence must have been taken under the sanctity of an oath.[70] It has been held that, where on the former trial the court had jurisdiction of the parties and power to administer oaths, the evidence may be received, although the court before which it was taken had no jurisdiction of the subject matter;[71] but this has been denied.[72]

A stipulation as to what a witness would testify at one trial has been held admissible on another trial after his death,[73] but there is also authority for the rejection of such evidence,[74] where the agreement was made merely to prevent a continuance.[75] The rule admitting former evidence does not permit the admission of a mere offer of a witness to testify to certain facts,[76] or a deposition, which was stricken out and did not become a part of the evidence on the former trial.[77]

The party against whom the evidence was introduced at the first trial may use it at the later trial,[78] unless the witness would have been disqualified from testifying in his favor at the first trial.[79]

It has been held that a transcript of the examination of defendant, taken at a former trial, is admissible to show that no reference or testimony was read from a card index introduced in the case.[80]

Objections to former evidence. The former evidence is, sometimes by reason of statute, open to any objections[81] going to the substance of the testimony, or the competency of the witness,[82] which would exclude the testimony of the witness to the same matters, save that objections which were available, but not urged, at the first trial cannot be urged at the subsequent trial,[83] especially where the witness is deceased.[84] In some jurisdictions the rule as to objections to the evidence relates only to its relevancy and materiality and not to its competency,[85] at least not to the competency of the witness at the time the testimony is offered at the second trial, see infra § 394.

fendant was prosecuted in a criminal proceeding it is improper to refer to defendant's failure to testify in the criminal case.[86]

Reciprocal right. In order that former testimony may be admissible when offered by one party, there must exist a reciprocal right in the other party to introduce it.[87]

§ 385. Nature of Former Trial

In order that former evidence may be admissible, it is not necessary that the evidence has been given on the trial of a cause in the exact technical shape of the second action; it may have been given at a previous regular trial of the same action, or at a former trial where the parties and issues were substantially the same, or at a preliminary hearing; but it may not have been given on an examination not directed to a defined issue, or at a coroner's inquest, or, in some jurisdictions, in a criminal proceeding.

Rather a broad meaning is given to the word "trial" as applied to the proceeding at which the evidence was originally adduced.[88] In general, it is sufficient if the point was investigated in a judicial proceeding of any kind, wherein the party to be affected by such testimony had the right of cross-examination.[89] It is not necessary that the former testimony should have been given on the trial of a cause in the exact technical shape of the second action.[90] The evidence received includes that given at a previous regular trial of the same action or suit[91] or proceeding;[92] and includes that given on a former trial where the parties and issues were substantially the same.[93] It also includes evidence

Testimony taken on examination before trial
(1) In action for injuries, refusal of court to permit defendant to read in evidence its own testimony taken by plaintiff on examination before trial was not error, since such testimony did not prejudice defendant or affect any of its substantial rights, especially in view of fact that court offered to allow defendant opportunity to produce witness on trial.—Kaufman v. John Abramson & Co., 288 N.Y.S. 305, 248 App.Div. 628.

(2) In insurer's action for premiums on liability policies, evidence given by defendant on examination before trial was admissible in so far as defendant was concerned, but was incompetent in so far as the evidence applied to an impleaded defendant which should have an opportunity to cross-examine the original defendant.—Van Schaick v. Sullivan, 271 N.Y.S. 537, 241 App.Div. 268, affirmed 195 N.E. 214, 266 N.Y. 591.

"Proceeding" construed
Word "proceeding" following "trial" in statute relating to reading of reported testimony of absent witness, was intended to include practically every inquiry which might invoke attention of court.—Martin v. Duncan Automobile Co., 296 P. 24, 53 Nev. 212.

Escheat proceeding
The testimony of a witness, since deceased, before orphans' court in escheat proceedings, which was a public one after due notice, was properly admitted on trial of claim of one alleging to be a relative of decedent, notwithstanding claimant was not present, and had no opportunity to cross-examine such witness, as such testimony was not testimony in another suit, but was testimony given in the escheat proceeding to which claimant became a party by traversing the finding of the orphans' court.—Commonwealth v. Evidence held admissible
Testimony taken in county court in support of claim against estate for board of deceased was admissible in subsequent action by claimant against widow, individually and as administratrix, to set aside alleged fraudulent conveyance by decedent, where witness had died since proceedings in county court.—Zimdars v. Zimdars, 295 N.W. 675, 236 Wis. 484.

(2) In husband's claim under intestate law against wife's will excluding him for his alleged desertion, deceased wife's evidence taken in her incompleted divorce action for desertion was admissible on issue of whether he had willfully, maliciously, and without proper cause deserted her, and whether she had consented to the desertion.—In re Nixon's Estate, 159 A. 172, 104 Pa.Super. 506.

(3) In proceeding to recover amount of note from deceased maker's estate, probate court properly admitted maker's testimony on issue whether note was his obligation at hearing before federal conciliation commissioner in bankruptcy proceeding wherein payee intervened.—George v. Davie, Ark., 145 S.W.2d 729.

Foreign suit
Testimony of defendant in foreign suit to establish prior lien on trust fund was admissible in local action to enforce claim against fund.—

brought out at a preliminary hearing,[94] or at a hearing to dissolve a temporary restraining order which was entered to preserve the res pending the disposition of the cause.[95] It has also been held that the testimony of voters in a John Doe proceeding to inquire into the validity of an election is admissible in a subsequent quo warranto proceeding to oust the official elected from office.[96]

On the other hand, the testimony of a witness on a general examination which is not directed to a defined issue, as an examination before a referee as to the acts, conduct, or property of a bankrupt, is not admissible in a subsequent proceeding involving relevant matters.[97] Evidence given at a coroner's inquest is inadmissible[98] except that such evidence has been held competent in some proceedings of a special nature, such as hearings before an industrial accident commission.[99] An examination of plaintiff, since deceased, before a commissioner, touching the truth of the matters set forth by him in an affidavit under which a capias ad respondendum had issued in the cause, is not admissible on the subsequent trial of the cause.[1]

Under statutes in some jurisdictions, in order that former evidence may be admissible it must be offered at a new trial of the same or identical action;[2] it is not enough that the litigation in the two actions or proceedings concern the same subject

Westchester Mortg. Co. v. Newport Trust Co., 146 A. 774, 50 R.I. 263.

94. Colo.—Gibson v. Gagnon, 257 P. 348, 82 Colo. 108.
22 C.J. p 428 note 69.

Disbarment proceeding

In proceeding to disbar attorney a transcript of the testimony of a deceased witness taken at the preliminary investigation of the case by the state bar committee is admissible.—In re Pate, 119 S.W.2d 11, 232 Mo.App. 478.

96. Wis.—State v. Thorson, 231 N. W. 155, 202 Wis. 31.

Public policy

Receipt of such evidence is not against public policy, for such proceeding is at most no more under ban of secrecy than proceeding before grand jury.—State v. Thorson, supra.

Privilege of secrecy of testimony

Defendant in quo warranto proceeding cannot object to introduction of testimony of voters given in proceeding to inquire into validity of election, even if such proceeding is on parity with grand jury proceeding, since the privilege of secrecy of the testimony is that of the witness and not that of defendant.—State v. Thorson, supra.

Conn.—Todd v. Bradley, 122 A. 68, 74, 99 Conn. 307.

Reason for rule

"The most serious and sufficient objection to the admissibility of such evidence is not the lack of opportunity for cross-examination, but that examinations of this kind are not confined to well-defined issues, properly made known to the persons concerned, with opportunity given to present evidence and be heard on questions of fact or law which will be raised or involved in the investigation. In such conditions the rules of evidence cannot be carefully applied, and the proceedings lack in these particulars the elements of the due process of law by which only may a person be deprived of his property."—Todd v. Bradley, supra.

"Further trial of case"

(1) Deceased witness' testimony in wife's personal injury action was inadmissible in husband's subsequent action for loss of consortium, husband's action not being "further trial of case" within statute.—Lord v. Boschert, 189 N.E. 863, 47 Ohio App. 54.

(2) Action by state under Compensation Act against employer who failed to comply with act brought after commission had made award is a "further trial," within statute, so as to permit introduction of testimony of witnesses before industrial commission.—Schomer v. State ex rel Bettman, 190 N.E. 638, 47 Ohio App. 84.

Retrial of "case"

(1) Under statute providing for use of former evidence on retrial of the case or proceeding, the word "case" is not used in a narrow, strictly legal, or technical sense.—E. H. Emery & Co. v. American Refrigerator Transit Co., 184 N.W. 750, 193 Iowa 93, 20 A.L.R. 86.

(2) The testimony of witnesses at a former trial, of a cause dismissed as to one of defendants, and dismissed without prejudice as to defendant in the trial of the present action, is admissible, the issues being the same and practically a retrial of the former "case."—E. H. Emery & Co. v. American Refrigerator Transit Co., supra.

(3) Transcript of testimony on hearing in habeas corpus to obtain custody of a child is not receivable, on application to modify divorce decree as to custody of child, to show what witnesses other than one of the parties testified to, since it is not a retrial of the habeas corpus action.—Barish v. Barish, 180 N.W. 724, 190 Iowa 493.

(4) Transcript of evidence of bankrupt taken before commissioner of bankruptcy is not admissible in action to recover shoes purchased by bankrupt, since evidence was not given at prior trial of same cause.—Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Shapiro, 205 N.W. 511, 200 Iowa 843.

matter,[3] and evidence of a statement made by a witness in an entirely different kind of litigation will be rejected.[4]

Creditors' meeting. In a suit to avoid as preferences payments made by a bankrupt, testimony by the bankrupt, given without objection, that the report of his testimony given at a meeting of the creditors was correct and that he confirmed it, constituted an adoption of such testimony as would permit the admission of the report in evidence.[5] In a suit by a trustee in bankruptcy to cancel a deed of the bankrupt's alleged to have been made to defraud creditors, the bankrupt's testimony when examined at a creditors' meeting before the referee in bankruptcy has been allowed in evidence against his grantee.[6]

Criminal proceeding. There is some authority which holds that testimony in a criminal case is admissible against the party thereto in a subsequent civil case,[7] at least where in the criminal case the prosecuting witness had charge and control of the case with power to examine the witnesses and the subsequent civil action involved the same act for which the criminal prosecution was instituted and was between the party instituting the criminal proceeding and defendant therein.[8] However, it has been held in other cases that testimony of a witness in a criminal proceeding is not admissible in a subsequent civil suit,[9] even though the civil suit is between the party instituting the criminal proceeding and defendant therein.[10] At any rate, where the party in the subsequent civil case against whom the testimony in the former criminal case is offered, had no control over such criminal case and had no opportunity therein to cross-examine the witness or to introduce evidence to rebut that offered, the testimony in such criminal case is not admissible in the subsequent civil case.[11]

§ 386. Tribunal before Which Evidence Given

The character of the tribunal before which former testimony was taken, whether it was an inferior court, or even a referee or arbitrator, usually is not a valid objection to the admissibility of the evidence on the subsequent trial.

The fact that the evidence was originally given before a subordinate court is not usually regarded as an objection to its reception.[12] Testimony given before referees,[13] quasi judicial tribunals,[14] and magistrates as arbitrators[15] has been received.

3. Ariz.—Tom Reed Gold Mines Co. v. Moore, 11 P.2d 347, 40 Ariz. 174.

Difference in actions

§ 387. Identity of Parties

To warrant the reception of evidence given at a former trial, the parties at the later trial must be substantially the same, although complete mutuality of parties is not required.

In order to warrant the reception of evidence given at a formal trial, it must appear that the parties to the later trial are, either actually or constructively, the same,[18] even though the subject matter of the actions is the same,[19] as otherwise the party against whom the evidence is offered could not have had the opportunity of cross-examining the witness, which, as appears infra § 390, is essential.

Minn.—Cox v. Selover, 213 N.W. 902, 171 Minn. 216.

Identity of parties held insufficient

(1) In action against railroad for overcharges, testimony before public service commission at previous hearing of company's application for increase in rates, at which plaintiff made no appearance, is inadmissible.—Green Mountain Log Co. v. Columbia & N. R. R. R., 16 P.2d 1106, 141 Or. 188.

(2) On petition to be adjudged competent, after a guardian for his person and estate had been appointed, testimony given by plaintiff in an assault case against petitioner was properly excluded.—In re Hallenberg's Guardianship, 174 N.W. 443, 144 Minn. 39.

Party in different capacities

(1) Testimony in former action is admissible where party, although acting in different capacities, that is, as administrator of testatrix and as administrator of testatrix's husband, represented in both cases the same ultimate beneficiaries.—Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Sherman, 185 A. 601, 56 R.I. 355.

(2) In action for death of husband, testimony of deceased witness at former trial of same suit relating to witness' testimony in another suit for death of wife sustained in same accident was inadmissible, since parties to actions were not same.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Scott, 167 So. 572, 232 Ala. 284.

This rule does not, however, require complete mutuality or identity of all parties;[20] it is sufficient that the parties to the action in which the evidence is offered were also parties opposed to each other in the former action.[21] A mere nominal change of parties is of no consequence provided the parties in the second action are so privy in interest with those on the former trial that the same motive and need for cross examination existed.[22] A change of parties by which a party is omitted will not prevent the admission of the evidence;[23] but the addition of new parties not privies, in the subsequent action will render the former evidence inadmissible,[24] at least on objection by such new party.[25]

§ 388. Privity

The requirement of identity of parties as a condition to the admission of former evidence is satisfied by the existence of a relation of privity between parties to the successive trials.

The requirement of identity of parties as a condition to the admission of former evidence see supra § 387, is satisfied by the existence of a relation of privity between parties to the successive trials.[26]

Privity in this respect means a person claiming under one of the former parties,[27] and comprehends,[28] and is limited to,[29] privies in blood, in law or in estate. Accordingly, the former evidence may be used by the executor or administrator of the party by whom it was originally introduced,[30] by the widow and minor children of an injured employee who sue for his death which arose out of the same accident for which in the former proceeding he sought compensation,[31] by the parents of a deceased child in an action for damages for his death where, by order of court, they were substituted as plaintiffs instead of the administrator of deceased who was plaintiff in the former trial;[32] or the former evidence may be used against the ex-

Identity of parties held sufficient

A wife, joining her husband in suit for partition of land claimed as her separate property, bore such relation to prior suit, wherein defendants' predecessor in title recovered land from husband, as to make testimony of witnesses in such suit on issues of adverse possession and nondelivery of deed to one through whom wife claimed title admissible against her on trial of partition suit. —Security Realty & Development Co v. Requirement as to dominant party

(1) In order that a party in the second case may be bound by the testimony in the former case, the party sought to be bound in the second case must have proceeded in the second case under or through the corresponding party to the relationship in the first case or on a right derived from such corresponding party. It is the dominant party which must be a party to the first case to lead to admissibility in the second case in favor of or against the subordinate party in the second case.—U. S. v. Aluminum Co. of America, D.C.N.Y., 1 F.R.D. 48.

(2) In determining whether there is privity in law between Federal Trade Commission and United States so as to make testimony of deceased witness in federal trade commission proceeding admissible in proceeding instituted by United States, the question is whether United States is in privity with federal trade commission, and not whether federal trade commission is in privity with United States.—U. S. v. Aluminum Co. of America, supra.

On the other hand the necessary privity does not arise from mere community of interest,[38] or merely from the relationship of husband and wife;[39] nor does it exist between devisee and executor[40] or next of kin and administrator.[41] Privity does not exist between an injured party who brought an action for his injuries and his personal representatives who sue for his death resulting from the injuries for which deceased formerly brought suit, where such cause of action for death is not a mere continuation of the right of action which deceased had in his lifetime, but is a new right of action created by statute.[42] There is no privity between an infant claiming damages for injuries to himself and a parent claiming damages for the loss of his services and medical expenses,[43] although the contrary has been asserted.[44] The parties are not the same where the first action is brought by a minor for his own personal injuries arising out of an accident and the other action is brought by several persons, one of whom is the plaintiff in the first action, suing on the statutory right granted them as heirs for the death of their ancestor, whose death was caused from injuries received in the same accident.[45]

In an action against officers of a corporation as individuals for commissions it has been held that plaintiff is entitled to introduce testimony of such officers in the trial of another action by plaintiff against the corporation wherein they testified that they, as individuals, had employed plaintiff.[46]

Party paying costs or employing counsel. The fact that one has contributed to the cost of defending an action, but without the right to intermeddle in any way with the conduct of the defense, does not render him privy to the action, so as to authorize the use against him of evidence taken therein,[47] but it has been held otherwise as to one who, although not a party to an action, employed a lawyer to defend it so that he was in fact represented therein by counsel.[48]

§ 389. Identity of Issues

The party seeking to introduce evidence given at a former trial must show that the issues on the two trials are substantially the same.

Methods of showing identity

(1) Only competent evidence of matter involved in former action, witness' testimony in trial of which is offered at trial of subsequent action because of his absence from state, is record of former action.—Redwing v. Moncravie, 32 P.2d 408, 138 Cal.App. 432.

satisfaction of the court[50] that the issue at the former trial was the same, or substantially the same, as the issue at the later trial.[51] The reason of this requirement is that, in the absence of such identity of issue, the opportunity for cross-examination at the former trial, see infra § 390, would have been of little or no value, and the test of identity is said to be found in the opportunity, at the former trial, to cross-examine the witness fully as to the matter in issue at the second trial.[52]

The requirement of identity is satisfied where the issue on which the former evidence is offered is common to both cases.[53] It is immaterial that there were other issues in either case,[54] except that the issues in the first case must have been the same as to each and every issue in the second case to which the testimony might properly have related if the witness had been present to testify in the second case.[55] It is immaterial that the form of action was changed;[56] that there is a nominal change of counts in the complaint;[57] that the complaint was amended, where it did not change the issues;[58] that on the second trial a party has a different theory of law;[59] or that the subject matter of the two actions is different,[60] although in some jurisdictions it has been stated that the subject matter of the two actions must be the same.[61] The rule does not require that the causes of action be identical.[62] Conversely, the evidence is rejected where the issue is not common to both actions, although they concern the same subject matter,[63] and the fact to which the evidence relates is material in both actions.[64]

The fact that the testimony was given on the hearing of a motion for a new trial in the former action instead of on the former trial of the case does not make it inadmissible in the subsequent case on the ground that there is not the required identity of issue.[65]

§ 390. Opportunity for Cross-Examination

In order that testimony given at a former trial may be admissible, the party against whom it is offered, or his representative, must have had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness.

In order that testimony given at a former trial may be admissible, it is necessary that the party against whom the evidence is offered, or some one identified with him in legal interest, should have had, at the time when the testimony was given, an opportunity to cross-examine the witness,[66] with respect to each and every issue in the second case to which the testimony of the witness might have properly related if he had been present to testify as a witness in the case.[67]

Where, however, such an opportunity has been actually afforded, the evidence is not to be rejected because the right to cross-examine was not exercised.[68] It is not essential to the admissibility of such former evidence that the party against whom it is offered was personally present at the former trial, if he was represented by counsel,[69] or if he had actual or constructive notice of the examination.[70] If the party against whom the evidence is offered, examined the witness on the former trial, it is immaterial whether the examination was direct or cross-examination.[71]

§ 391. Excuses for Nonproduction of Witness

In order that the testimony of a witness on a former trial may be admissible, it is essential, and the party offering the testimony must satisfactorily show, that

Ex parte affidavit

(1) An ex parte affidavit made by witness since deceased, for use on hearing of application for interlocutory relief in same case is not admissible on final trial of case.—Byrd v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 196 S.E. 72, 185 Ga. 625.

(2) On setting aside of default judgments in actions for rent, permitting plaintiff to use on second trial ex parte affidavit and lease used in first trial to make out a prima facie case instead of compelling plaintiff to establish its case by testimony subject to cross-examination was error.—McArdle Real Estate Co. v. McGowan, 172 A. 786, 12 N.J.Misc. 500.

(3) Other cases see Fender v. Ramsey, 62 S.E. 527, 131 Ga. 440—22 C.J. p 431 note 4 [d].

Impleaded defendant

Evidence given on examination before trial was incompetent in so far as evidence applied to impleaded defendant which should have opportunity to cross-examine witness.—Van Schaick v. Sullivan, 271 N.Y.S. 537, 241 App.Div. 268, affirmed 195 N.E. 214, 266 N.Y. 591.

Sufficiency of notice

Whatever puts a party on inquiry amounts to notice, provided inquiry becomes a duty and would lead to knowledge of facts by exercise of ordinary intelligence and understanding. Placing the case on the trial list was sufficient notice.—Arnold v. Carroll, supra.

71. Ala.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Scott, 167 So. 572, 232 Ala. 84.

the witness is inaccessible or otherwise unable to testify, and, in some jurisdictions, that the witness' deposition could not have been obtained.

Where not otherwise objectionable, see supra §§ 385–390, the testimony of a witness on a former trial of the case may be introduced on a subsequent trial thereof where the witness is inaccessible[72] or otherwise unable to testify,[73] but if the witness is available his former testimony is not admissible.[74] Where the statutes expressly enumerate the cases in which the testimony given by a witness on a former trial may be admitted on a subsequent trial, the former testimony may be admitted only in those cases enumerated.[75]

A party seeking to introduce the testimony of a witness given on a former trial must first introduce preliminary evidence of the existence of the reasons for its introduction.[76] He must show that the witness or witnesses whose testimony is offered are not available for examination at the time of the trial,[77] and that it is impossible for him to procure their attendance and testimony.[78] According to

Exclusion of oral testimony to admit former testimony

Trial judge cannot exclude oral testimony of witnesses present in court, and admit instead thereof their printed testimony on another occasion.—Williamson v. Casa-Eguia, 170 N.E. 486, 253 N.Y. 41, reversing 234 N.Y.S. 449, 226 App.Div. 195.

Propriety of consideration of former testimony

Where witness could not remember testimony he had given on former trial of same cause, action of trial court in taking into consideration his notes, or recollection of his notes, or of testimony at former trial, was reversible error.—Friedman v. Steinhauser, N.J., 180 A. 378.

Prima facie showing

A prima facie showing is sufficient.—Estill v. Citizens' & Southern Bank, 113 S.E. 552, 153 Ga. 618.

Affidavits

(1) The filing of affidavit by party or his attorney is indispensable prerequisite to introduction of testimony of witness on former trial in absence of something in record showing unavailability of witnesses.—Home Laundry Co. v. Cook, 125 S.W.2d 763, 277 Ky. 8—Wallace v. Lackey, 250 S.W. 843, 199 Ky. 190.

(2) Affidavit should be filed before the trial is entered on.—Southern Ry. in Kentucky v. Owen, 176 S.W. 25, 164 Ky. 571.

(3) Affidavit should state facts rather than conclusions.—Devine v.

some authorities it is necessary to show that it has been impossible to secure the deposition of the witness for use on the trial,[79] but this preliminary proof is not required by other authorities.[80]

The preliminary proof should be full and convincing,[81] and the inability of the witness to appear must be established by a ruling of the court or by agreement of counsel.[82] The sufficiency of such proof is primarily a question for the trial court[83] and is largely within its discretion,[84] which will not be interfered with unless an abuse of discretion is shown.[85] The court should find the facts with regard to the reason alleged for inability to produce the witness or take his deposition,[86] and, if it is decided that the proper conditions for admitting former evidence exist, a party may insist on its admission as a matter of right.[87]

A female whose testimony, under the statute, can be taken by interrogatories, and who cannot be compelled to attend court in person under subpœna, is not such an inaccessible witness as permits her testimony on a former trial to be used.[88]

§ 392. Death

Testimony given at a former trial or hearing by a witness since deceased is admissible.

Where it is affirmatively shown that a witness is dead,[89] and other prerequisites exist, the testimony given by him at a former trial or hearing should be received.[90]

At common law

To authorize the introduction of former testimony it was necessary to show that the witness was dead; absence from the state was not enough, because he might be found and examined on commission.—Longacre v. Yonkers R. Co., 182 N.Y.S. 373, 191 App.Div. 770.

Discretion of court

Whether or not a witness beyond the jurisdiction of the state is "inaccessible" in the sense in which that word is used in the Code is, in each particular case, a question for determination by the trial judge, in the exercise of a sound discretion.—Atlanta & C. Air-Line Ry. Co. v. Gravitt, 20 S.E. 550, 93 Ga. 369, 44 Am.S.R. 145.

Notice of intention to use former testimony

The testimony of witnesses on former trial, who were residents of a county other than one wherein trial was had, could be used and read in evidence on subsequent trial without a previous notice being given of an intention so to do.—Gaty v. United Rys. Co., Mo., 251 S.W. 61—Scully v. Rolwing, Mo.App., 115 S. W.2d 96.

Beyond reach of process

The words "beyond the jurisdiction of the court" in statute authorizing introduction of former testimony are to be construed as meaning beyond the reach of the process of the court.—New York Cent. R. Co. v. Stevens, 185 N.E. 542, 126 Ohio St. 395, 87 A.L.R. 884.

Within United States

The fact that the witness is within the United States, although out of the jurisdiction of the court, does not render his evidence given at a former trial of the same case inadmissible.—Welp v. Bogy, 277 S.W. 600, 218 Mo.App. 414.

Within reach of process

Statute providing that evidence given in a former trial may be proved in a subsequent trial, where the witness is deceased, or out of the state, or unable to testify, does not apply where a witness, although absent from the place of trial, is within the state and can be subpœnaed, as the words "unable to testify" refer only to the mental or physical inability of the witness.—Hansen-Rynning v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 209 P. 462, 105 Or. 67.

the state, his absence is by reason of military or naval service.[93] In some jurisdictions former testimony may be received where the party offering the evidence has made diligent but fruitless efforts to locate the witness.[94] While the requirement does not exist in some jurisdictions,[95] in other jurisdictions the absence of a witness will not authorize the admission of his former testimony unless it has been impossible to secure his deposition for use on the trial,[96] or to induce him to come to the place of trial and testify.[97]

It is incumbent on the party seeking to introduce the former evidence to show the existence of foregoing circumstances, failing in which the evidence cannot be received.[98] The former testimony of a

Willingness to appear

Former testimony of witness who is outside jurisdiction of court is admissible even though such witness would be willing to appear and testify or his deposition could be taken.—Almar Building & Loan Ass'n v. Broad St. Trust Co., 176 A. 767, 116 Pa.Super. 465.

Presence at trial on prior day

Transcript of testimony given by witness at former trial is admissible where witness although subpœnaed and present on first day of trial, was not present when transcript of his testimony was offered.—Sculley v. Rolwing, Mo.App., 88 S.W.2d 394.

Outside of county

(1) In some jurisdictions, permitting introduction of testimony of a witness, given at a former hearing, who, at the time of the trial, resided outside of the county in which the trial was held, is proper.

Okl.—King Auto Service v. Hodges, 288 P. 483, 143 Okl. 260—Caldwell v. Kuykendall, 221 P. 84, 94 Okl. 84.

(2) In other jurisdictions a witness is not out of jurisdiction of court within rule permitting admission of former testimony of absent witness merely because he does not reside in or may not be found in county in which trial is had.—Carter v. Irvine, Tex.Civ.App., 77 S.W.2d 247.

(3) Residence in another county of the state does not render the witness inaccessible, so as to admit his former testimony.—Brinson R. Co. v. Beard, 76 S.E. 76, 11 Ga.App. 737.

Showing of absence

A showing that witness for defendant at former trial no longer resided at apartment where he had resided four and one-half years before was an insufficient showing of his absence from place of trial to justify admission of his testimony at former trial.—Collins v. Leahy, 125 S.W.2d 874, 344 Mo. 250.

In Nevada

(1) By express statutory enactment former testimony is allowed in evidence where the witness is beyond the jurisdiction of the court.—Martin v. Duncan Automobile Co., 296 P. 24, 53 Nev. 212.

(2) Formerly it was held that the rule applicable to the testimony of a dead witness did not apply to the testimony of one who was beyond the jurisdiction of the court, so that where the residence of a witness outside the jurisdiction was known, or could have been discovered by the exercise of due diligence, and his testimony could have been taken by commission, his testimony taken on a former trial was excluded.—Gerhauser v. North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, 7 Nev. 174.

Liberal application of rule in civil cases

The rule is more liberally applied to civil than to criminal cases.—Rotter v. Detroit United Ry., 187 N.W. 271, 217 Mich. 686.

Requirement of due diligence

(1) Due diligence must be exercised to find a witness before transcript of his testimony at former trial can be admitted.—Welp v. Bogy, 277 S.W. 600, 218 Mo.App. 414.

(2) No definite rule can be laid down as to what would constitute a showing of due diligence in all cases. Generally, the question of the sufficiency of the proof as to the showing of due diligence is confided to the discretion of the trial judge.—Welp v Bogy, supra—22 C.J. p 435 note 17 [a].

(3) The issuance of subpœnas, the delivery of the same to the sheriff or to any person authorized by law to serve the same, search for the witness, and return of the subpœnas "not found" will generally satisfy the requirements of due diligence.—Welp v. Party as witness

Plaintiff who is outside the jurisdiction and is financially unable to attend the trial is not entitled to introduce in evidence testimony given by him on a former trial, for if living, he should be present or have his deposition taken.—Hubbard v. Schofield, 125 S.E. 221, 97 W.Va. 453.

witness is not admissible where he is within the jurisdiction of the court and could have been reached by subpoena, and is not otherwise disqualified.[99]

Permanency of absence. Some authorities consider that the absence of the witness must have a character of permanency, and a mere transient absence will not suffice,[1] but generally it is sufficient to show that the witness is actually absent at the time of the trial,[2] although merely for a temporary purpose.[3]

Absence from court room. Absence from the court room is sometimes, under statute, regarded as sufficient to warrant introducing the absent witness' former testimony.[4]

Procurement or connivance of party. In some jurisdictions the absence of the witness must have occurred without the procurement or connivance of the party seeking to introduce the former testimony.[5] Where it appears that the party against whom the testimony of the witness would probably militate has been instrumental in preventing the attendance of the witness, the former evidence is admitted almost as a matter of course.[6]

§ 394. Disqualification

The testimony of a witness on a former trial is admissible where he has since become incompetent to testify by reason of the death of the adverse party, his own physical disability or, in some jurisdictions, by the acquisition of an interest in the controversy. Civil death of the witness by reason of a felony will not render his former testimony admissible.

Where a party or an interested witness has become incompetent by reason of the death of the Right to prove absence of witness

Party offering former testimony must be permitted to make proof of absence of witness.—Caldwell v. Kuykendall, 221 P. 84, 94 Okl. 84.

Sufficiency of showing
(1) Evidence held sufficient.

Joseph, 142 S.W.2d 970, 283 Ky. 735.

(3) Testimony of officer that subpœna for the witness had been placed in his hands and he returned it to the clerk of the court indorsed "Not found in the county." was a sufficient foundation for the admission of the evidence, for the presumption of law is that the officer has performed the duties of his office and such return was equivalent to a statement that he had made the proper search for the witness and was unable to find him in the county.—Caldwell v. Kuykendall, 221 P. 84, 94 Okl. 84.

(4) Evidence that witness who had given testimony no longer resided at apartment where he had resided four and one-half years before was insufficient to show that his testimony could not be obtained.—Collins v. Leahy, 125 S.W.2d 874, 344 Mo. 250.

(5) An affidavit, reciting that two witnesses were absent from state and that affiant was informed that one of them was in certain state and the other in third state, but did not know either's address, was insufficient.—Nowak v. Joseph, 142 S.W.2d 970, 283 Ky. 735.

(6) Proof that witness had come down from another state for former trial about a month previously, had been given money to return, and had been seen at a railway station waiting for a train, was insufficient showing of her absence from the state on present trial to justify reading in evidence her former testimony.—Longacre v. Yonkers R. Co., 182 N.Y.S. 373, 191 App.Div. 770.

(7) Where only evidence as to whereabouts of one whose testimony on former trial was sought to be introduced was that he had been in California for about two years, but it was not shown that he was a nonresident, or that his whereabouts was unknown, or that his deposition could not have been taken, such testimony was properly excluded.—United Telephone Co. v. Co. v. Koonce, 171 So. 269, 233 Ala. 265.

(2) Where plaintiff stated that witness at a former trial was in Indiana, and had been living there more than a year, this did not show that witness was permanently and indefinitely absent from the jurisdiction, so as to justify admission of his testimony.—Hines v. Miniard, 94 So. 302, 208 Ala. 176.

adverse party, see the C.J.S. title Witnesses § 132, also 70 C.J. p 206 note 26–p 211 note 85, his testimony at a former trial, when the adverse party was living, generally may be received.[7] The testimony of a witness on a former trial of the case on a question of the genuineness of a signature is admissible where he is disqualified from testifying on the subsequent trial by reason of blindness.[8]

Where the disqualification results from the acquisition of an interest in the controversy since the witness testified, it has been held in some jurisdictions that the former testimony should be received[9] while in other jurisdictions the testimony has been rejected,[10] but as is shown in the C.J.S. title Witnesses § 131, also 70 C.J. p 202 note 87–p 206 note 25, under the modern statutory rule a witness is not disqualified by reason of interest.

Former evidence is not made competent because the witness has become civilly dead by reason of felony.[11]

§ 395. Mental Incapacity

Former testimony may be received where the witness has become insane or mentally incapacitated, but mere failure of the witness' memory ordinarily does not justify the admission of former testimony.

Where a witness has become insane or mentally incapacitated, his former evidence is received[12] where it appears that he is likely to remain in that condition,[13] although it is otherwise in cases of mere failure of memory, not amounting to imbecility.[14] However, it has been stated that, considering that testimony given by a witness on confirmation of a default could be admissible in an action to annul the judgment rendered therein, by reason of the fact that the matter was remote and the witness unable to recall the facts testified to, or that he had testified at all, such evidence would not be admissible unless it was first ascertained that the witness could not recall the facts testified to after being shown the evidence.[15]

§ 396. Inability to Attend

Physical inability of a witness to testify, resulting from illness, old age, or other infirmity, and inability to attend because of official or professional duties, may constitute sufficient reasons for receiving his former testimony.

In a number of jurisdictions physical inability of the witness to testify has been held a sufficient reason for receiving his former testimony.[16] Although there is some contrary authority,[17] illness of a witness, preventing his attendance, has been held a sufficient reason for receiving his former testimony,[18] provided, in some jurisdictions, it is not temporary but of such a character that in all reasonable probability the witness will never be able to attend the trial.[19] Extreme age[20] and great bodily infirmity[21] of the witness have been held sufficient reasons for receiving his former evidence.

Inability of a witness to attend, by reason of being engaged in an official duty, has been held to render his former testimony admissible,[22] and a similar rule has been established by statute with respect to a witness who is engaged in professional duties.[23]

§ 397. Scope of Proof Required

a. In general

b. Accuracy as to language of witness on former trial

a. In General

All of the testimony of the witness on the former trial is admissible, but the authorities do not agree as to whether the entire testimony must be introduced.

In general, all of the former testimony of the witness is admissible.[24] If the evidence of a witness on a former trial is established by the testimony of a person who heard it, see infra § 401, the reporting witness must be able to recollect all of the testimony given by the witness,[25] at least as far as it relates to matters relevant to the action in which it is sought to be used.[26] This requires that the reporting witness shall be able to state what the witness on the former trial said both on direct examination and on cross-examination,[27] where it appears that there was a cross-examination,[28] the result of which was to modify the testimony given on direct examination.[29]

It has been laid down that the entire testimony of the witness on the former trial should be put in evidence;[30] but according to other authorities as long as the former testimony is available[31] the party need put in evidence only so much thereof as he desires,[32] and it is then the right of the adverse party, at his option, to supplement the evidence, as

Inability as excuse for lack of diligence

That an absent witness was physically unable to attend trial or have her deposition taken did not excuse the party desiring her evidence for not using due diligence in securing or attempting to secure her testimony, or, if she could not attend, being prepared to make a proper showing for a continuance, or for the introduction of her testimony on a former trial.—Estill v. The rule is applicable even though a physician's certificate is not produced.—Team v. Green, 211 P. 791, 106 Or. 311.

Waiver of objection

Testimony of witness in former case who was unable to testify in instant case on account of illness, was admissible where objection that failure to testify was due to illness instead of death was waived.—Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Sherman, 185 A. 601, 56 R.I. 355.

given by introducing other portions of such testimony.[33] The party may offer only the direct examination or such portions thereof as he deems material, and need not introduce the cross-examination,[34] and the adverse party may introduce the cross-examination and portions of the direct examination not introduced,[35] and it will be considered not as his own evidence, but as evidence of the party who first introduced the former testimony.[36] A transcript containing only a portion of the evidence may be introduced where the remainder of the evidence is testified to by witnesses.[37]

Where the former testimony is read to the jury, only the questions which the witness answered may be read, and not those which he was not permitted to answer, especially where the questions to which objections were sustained were of such a form and nature that the mere asking would prejudice a jury.[38]

b. Accuracy as to Language of Witness on Former Trial

Originally it was required that the reporting witness should be able to state in identical words the language of the witness on the former trial, but under the modern rule the reporting witness need give only the substance of the former testimony.

Originally it was required that the reporting witness should be able to state in identical words the language of the witness on the former trial.[39] However, it came to be recognized that the strictness of this requirement practically nullified the rule admitting former evidence,[40] and at an early day the rigor of the requirement was relaxed.[41] The result has been the establishment of the modern rule that it is sufficient that the substance of the former testimony be given by the reporting witness.[42]

The practical application of the modern rule is by no means uniform; some courts require very strict accuracy in reporting the language of the witness on the former trial,[43] while others are satisfied with a less strict adherence to what was actually said by the witness, provided it appears that a substantially correct report of his testimony is presented.[44] It must appear to the satisfaction of the court that the reporting witness can comply with whatever degree of strictness is required by the law of the jurisdiction in which the former testimony is to be used.[45]

§ 398. Media of Proof

The testimony given on a former trial may be proved by any competent evidence.

The testimony given on a former trial may be proved by any competent evidence.[46] The various means of proving evidence given on a former trial are discussed infra §§ 399–401.

§ 399. Notes or Memoranda

a. In general
b. Of attorney
c. Of judge
d. Of stenographer

a. In General

Former testimony may be proved by a writing thereof taken under the sanction of the court, or by notes thereof taken by any person who will swear to their accuracy; a person who took notes of the former testimony may use them to refresh his recollection.

Where the original testimony was reduced to writing under the sanction of the court, the writing is competent and the best evidence.[47] Although there is authority to the contrary,[48] generally, a witness who has no present recollection of the former testimony can make his notes of such testimony evidence by testifying to a recollection that they were accurate when made;[49] and, a fortiori, it is no objection that a reporting witness cannot state the former testimony from his recollection alone without reference to his minutes or memoranda.[50] Where it is shown that the original notes have been lost, a copy may be used.[51]

To refresh his recollection, a witness may use contemporaneous notes which he took of former testimony,[52] or he may use other memoranda.[53]

b. Of Attorney

Notes taken by counsel in the former trial are competent memoranda for proof of the testimony therein, but they are not evidence per se.

Notes taken by counsel for the purpose of the trial are competent memoranda for proof of former evidence,[54] and they may be used to refresh his recollection.[55] However, they are not evidence per se.[56]

c. Of Judge

Where properly authenticated, the minutes of the judge before whom the former trial was held are competent evidence of the testimony given thereat, but they are of no higher grade than other competent evidence of the former testimony.

The minutes of the judge before whom the former trial or hearing was held are competent evidence of the testimony given thereat,[57] provided, but not unless, they are properly authenticated[58] by the oath of the judge,[59] and reinforced by some personal recollection on his part.[60]

Such minutes, not being an official record, are no higher grade of evidence than any other competent evidence of the former testimony,[61] and in modern times their importance and use has been lessened by the use of stenography in court.[62]

d. Of Stenographer

The former testimony of a witness may be proved by the authenticated notes of a stenographer, particularly those of the official court stenographer, but such notes do not constitute evidence per se, unless such effect has been given to them by statute.

The purpose of having testimony taken down in shorthand is to preserve it for future reference,[63] and there is a very general tendency to recognize the accuracy and disinterestedness of the work of an official stenographer.[64] The former testimony of a witness may be proven by the official stenographer.[65] The testimony may be read by the stenographer who took it.[66]

Transcript of notes. A transcript of the stenographer's notes may be used to prove the testimony given by a witness at a former trial,[67] although the

testimony is not embodied in a bill of exceptions.[68] The transcript must be authenticated in some way,[69] as by the oath[70] or testimony[71] of the stenographer as to its accuracy; but testimony of the presiding judge that the transcript is correct is inadmissible.[72]

The transcript is not evidence per se,[73] except where it has been given this effect by statute;[74] and in some jurisdictions it has no greater efficacy than notes taken by the judge or any other person.[75] However, it has been stated that a transcript of the notes of the official court stenographer constitutes the best evidence of the former testimony of a witness,[76] and it has even been accorded a prima facie effect;[77] but it is not conclusive even though it is admissible by reason of statute,[78] and it is not the best evidence in the sense that all other evidence is secondary and inadmissible.[79]

Parol explanation of notes. Parol explanation has been held competent to make the stenographer's notes clear.[80]

§ 400. Record

Testimony given in the former trial may be proved from official records thereof, although the authorities do not agree as to whether such testimony may be proved by a bill of exceptions containing the testimony.

Where the former testimony is contained in a public record it may be proved by the admission in evidence of the original record itself.[81] It has been held that the former evidence of a witness may be proved by a certificate of evidence in a chancery case, signed by the judge and constituting part of the record,[82] by an agreed brief of evidence, considered and approved by the court,[83] by the agreed statement of case on appeal,[84] by a "case" settled and certified by the judge, pursuant to statute and containing all the evidence,[85] by an original bill of testimony approved by the judge, certified to by the clerk, and filed in the court of appeals,[86] by a transcript of the evidence incorporat-ized.—Houghton v. Grimes, 151 A. 642, 103 Vt. 54.

Showing required

Absent witness' testimony at former trial was properly excluded, in absence of showing that transcript of evidence taken thereat was made by official reporter, duly appointed and sworn, or that testimony was transcribed or certified as correct.—Redwing v. Moncravie, 32 P.2d 408, 138 Cal.App. 432.

Certificate of appellate court clerk

Unofficial stenographer

Where stenographer was not the official court reporter, and proper foundation was not laid for use of notes to refresh memory, transcript of testimony should not have been admitted.—Nalley v. ed in the case made,[87] or by a certified copy of the record of testimony.[88]

On the other hand, a record of a county clerk's office cannot be used to show evidence although it contains a transcript of the testimony,[89] and former testimony may not be proved by a certified copy of the statement of facts on a former appeal, not shown to have been made up from stenographer's notes, and of the verity of which there is no other proof.[90] A fortiori, a statement of facts prepared in contemplation of an appeal and not containing the detailed testimony of the witness is not competent.[91]

Docket entries are admissible in a subsequent action to show the allowance of a substitute declaration after trial before an auditor.[92]

Bill of exceptions. In some jurisdictions a bill of exceptions containing the testimony is not alone sufficient to prove the testimony of a witness on a former trial,[93] and is not admissible in evidence in proof thereof, unless called for by the opposite party.[94] In other jurisdictions such a bill is sufficient for the purpose;[95] but it is not the sole method of proving former testimony and its availability does not preclude the use of other methods.[96] In such case, inasmuch as the transcript of the evidence, when properly filed and incorporated in the bill of exceptions, becomes an official record, either the original transcript contained in the bill, or the official carbon copy thereof filed with the papers, must be introduced, or a copy thereof duly certified by the clerk of the appellate court or by the clerk of the court having the legal custody of the original papers;[97] an unofficial copy thereof is not admissible on proof by an attorney in the case that, in his judgment, it was a correct copy of the original transcript.[98]

A bill of exceptions is admissible in aid of the memory of a witness who testifies to the former evidence,[99] and it is sometimes permitted by statute that a bill of exceptions may be read on a subsequent trial as a deposition.[1]

§ 401. Witnesses

The former evidence of a witness may be established by the testimony of any person who can swear to it from memory, even though, according to some authorities, the testimony was taken down in shorthand and transcribed.

Testimony of witnesses at a former trial, between the same parties involving the same subject matter, transcribed by the court reporter from his stenographic report, certified and incorporated in the case made, signed and settled by the trial judge, and filed with the district court clerk, is admissible in evidence as depositions, although the reporter's notes were not filed as required by statute.—Kansas City, M. & O. At common law

Under the common law, the method of proving the former evidence of a witness, since deceased or unavailable, was by a person who heard him testify.—Tom Reed Gold Mines Co. v. Moore, 11 P.2d 347, 40 Ariz. 174.

3. Ga.—Galloway v. Hogg, 146 S.E. 156, 167 Ga. 502.

sions making the stenographic notes evidence per se of the testimony of a witness at a former trial.[4] However, there is also authority for the view that where there is a transcript of the former evidence it cannot be proved by the testimony of witnesses;[5] and if the testimony of an inaccessible witness, given in a former trial, has been reduced to writing, and agreed on as correct between the parties, and filed under the sanction and approval of the court, it must be adduced.[6]

The witness cannot use memoranda, of the accuracy of which he has no knowledge and the source of which is not known.[7] It is not proper to examine the witness by reading to him, from an alleged transcript, what purport to be extracts from the former testimony and asking him whether such testimony was given.[8]

§ 402. Effect and Impeachment

a. Effect
b. Impeachment

a. Effect

Former testimony, when introduced, is original evidence, equivalent, under certain conditions, to a deposition; a party is not conclusively bound by the testimony of himself or of his witness on a former trial.

Testimony given at a former trial, when introduced in evidence, is original evidence,[9] and should be considered by the jury and given the same effect as though the witnesses at the former trial had repeated their testimony in open court.[10] However, prior contradictory statements of the witness, made in a prior proceeding, do not constitute affirmative evidence or evidence in chief of the facts stated.[11]

When former testimony is preserved in the shorthand notes of an official court reporter it is in weight the equivalent of a deposition,[12] and, it has been stated, is likely to be more satisfactory.[13]

Testimony by a party on a former trial of the case,[14] or of another case,[15] will not estop him from giving testimony contradictory thereto, if he can show that his former testimony was given inconsiderately, by mistake, or without full knowledge of the facts.[16] His former testimony is not conclusive

Ga.—Maynard v. Rawlins, 163 S.E. 269, 45 Ga.App. 91.
Hawaii.—Lalakea v. Laupahoehoe Sugar Co., 33 Hawaii 745.

Testimony of party

Testimony of a party on a former trial, contradicted by him on the subsequent trial, should, when introduced in evidence in the later trial, be considered as substantive evidence and it is error to restrict its purposes to corroboration and impeachment.—Miller v. Melton-Rhodes Co., 102 S.E. 782, 179 N.C. 467.

Exclusion of other evidence to prove same facts

Where the original defendant had died since the first trial of the cause, and his widow and sole devisee was substituted as defendant, and she introduced the evidence of her deceased husband given at the former trial, her evidence should be confined to what took place after his death, and she should not have been permitted to testify to any facts occurring in his lifetime.—Wallace v. Lackey, 250 S.W. 843, 199 Ky. 190.

10. Ala.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Holmes, 134 So. 875, 876, 223 Ala. 188, citing Corpus Juris.
Ga.—Maynard v. Rawlins, 163 S.E. 269, 45 Ga.App. 91.
22 C.J. p 443 note 5.

Competency of testimony for other purposes

In proceedings against policeman charged with perjury, transcript of testimony in police court in another case is competent only to show policeman's testimony.—Armstrong v. Board of Civil Service Com'rs of City of Newport, 48 S.W.2d 1055, 243 Ky. 415.

Effect of contradictory statements

Where the evidence of a witness who testified in another case is admitted in evidence in the present case and the witness also testifies in the present case the effect of the evidence given on the trial of the other case will not be destroyed by any contradictions by the witness in the present case, such contradictions merely raising an issue of fact.—Lalakea v. Laupahoehoe Sugar Co., 33 Hawaii 745.

Okl.—Brittain v. Puckett, 48 P.2d 1058, 173 Okl. 422.

Equal dignity

13. Fla.—Habig v. Bastian, 158 So. 508, 117 Fla. 864.

Testimony in former case as admission against party on subsequent trial see supra § 311.

against him,[17] even though it is unexplained.[18]

Any discrepancy in the testimony of a witness testifying on different trials of a cause should be resolved in favor of the earlier testimony, the transaction then being fresher in his mind.[19] A party is not bound by the testimony of his witnesses at a former trial where the testimony of other witnesses at a subsequent trial is inconsistent therewith,[20] and he need not explain the testimony of his witnesses at the former trial.[21]

b. Impeachment

Former evidence may be impeached by showing the reputation of the absent witness, but such evidence may not be impeached by showing contradictory statements by such witness.

Former evidence may be impeached by showing that the reputation of the absent witness was bad when the evidence was given,[22] but it is usually held that it cannot be impeached by showing contradictory statements by the former witness.[23]
